After having attributed to me unfriendliness to Free Religion, Mr. Sunderland goes on to attack Spiritualism itself. But his reasoning is such that an answer is scarcely called for; and if it were, the columns of THE INDEX are not, as I think, the proper place for it. He says that Spiritualism is a system of "raps;" nothing, in the way of facts, but "raps;" that all else is "inferences" from the raps; that Spiritualism, like theology, requires "faith" in these "inferences;" and he asks, "What does the Spiritualist know of man's condition after death, any more than the Methodist or any other Christian who sings—

"We know, by faith we know?"

In the present position of Spiritualism, no man who can thus express himself about it is likely to do it harm, much less to impede its progress. I will just add, however, that a further notice of me by Mr. Sunderland, appearing in THE INDEX, will be regarded as a permission to me to furnish an answer according to my ability in that paper.

J. T. BLAKENEY.

DUNKIRK, N. Y., Aug. 15, 1872.

[We cheerfully devote such space as we have at command to discussion that does not degenerate into personality,—for which we have no space at all. But it is fairness, not "neutrality," which we seek always to maintain. All sides of these great questions need to be strongly presented; and it is the crowning triumph of Free Religion when earnest differences are vigorously but kindly and candidly urged. Diversity in unity rather than tame uniformity is to be desired. We did not feel in the least degree annoyed when Dr. Blakeney criticised our own article, knowing how true a friend he is to our common cause; and we hope he will not be offended if we suggest that he has no real reason to be annoyed by Mr. Sunderland's article, which was, we thought, not at all unfriendly in tone. Let us all aim to eliminate our own sensitiveness from what we write; which will greatly increase its value to those who take little interest in our subjective sensations.—Ed.]

BABYTEMS.—Little Annie's grandmother, after a long and painful sickness, had departed this life. During her sickness her false teeth proved troublesome, and were removed and carefully laid away in a box in the upper bureau drawer. One day, as the mother was looking over the drawer, Annie, having pushed her chair to the bureau, busied herself likewise. Presently the deft little fingers uncovered the above-mentioned box. Dropping the cover with a start, and instantly striking the pose of a miniature tragedy queen, with blue eyes and plump arms turned upward, she exclaimed:—"There, mother! grandma's gone to heaven without her teeth!"

The same little woman had one day taken her stand on a chair by the table at which her aunt, by the help of her best clothes, was making an elaborate toilet for an evening party. After watching with intense interest and admiration the beautifying process, when all was finished she exclaimed with an immensely patronizing air:—"O, aunt C., how nice you would look if you only had a pretty face!"

Little George's mother had been absent several weeks. George wished to write to her, and borrowing papa's pencil, with a large sheet of paper laid on a chair, produced, after much rumination, the following epistle:—

"Dear ma,—I want to see you. I took a walk this morning. I saw a drunken man; he fell down. Your affectionate son, GEORGE."

"P. S.—And couldn't get up."

The editor of this paper, lately going to visit a friend in Washington, kissed the little children at the door, and was immediately shown to her room. While occupied for a few moments in laying off her travelling garments, sweet little Ulla, standing by her mother's side in the library, looked up, and with a wistful face propounded this question:—"Mamma, please tell me what relation Mrs. M. is to us. Is she one of our first parents?"—Baltimore True Woman.

ADVICE.—It is very pleasant and profitable to receive letters, giving the ripest views of people of elegant leisure on the proper method of conducting a journal. Probably the failure of almost all the unsuccessful papers may be traced to the lack of advice. We have reaped inestimable advantages from this friendly intervention. When we were informed that the facetious features of our paper were not in the least funny, we were enabled through this valuable suggestion to commit that entire department to a gentleman who has taken a full course in one of our first theological seminaries, and no further complaints on that subject are forthcoming.

We hope to accomplish the same improvements in the matter of style, which occasionally exercises the pure mind of some correspondent from the remoter districts. It is a mere question of time and a more perfect acquaintance with the wishes of our subscribers. All styles are alike to this editorial staff. Our steady gait is Milton's prose, but we are quite willing to drop, in a friendly way, into the once popular methods of Macaulay, Washington Irving, or Charles Lamb. Of course all these cannot be given in any single issue. The gentleman who does the Johnsonese was furloughed, to play the big drum at the Boston Jubilee; and the Addison man has gone a-fishing for the summer; the Carlylist and the Brownsonian, too, are not allowed outside the puzzle department. Still, much can be done with those who remain. Let us have light. Advice is what we want. One hundred and twenty-nine thousand nine hundred and fifty subscribers still to be heard from. Keep on writing.—Chr. Union.

GREELEY'S FIRST VETO MESSAGE.—The following is an advance copy of the first veto of President Greeley:—

"An act to raise revenue by imposing a duty of ten cents a ton on guano."

Comments by the President.

I return this obnoxious measure without my approval. The man who introduced it is an ass; the men who voted for it are scheming British agents, and the men who say this is not the case are liars and horse-thieves. I judge that, on an average, every man, woman and child in America uses a ton of guano a year, in some shape or other—whether as the farmer in New York, Louisiana, Colorado, Podunk, etc., in agriculture, or as Charles A. Dana, for editorial articles. We thus consume, in round figures, forty million tons of guano annually. The arbitrary and revolutionary act which I veto to-day would thus impose a tax of $4,000,000 a year on our people. With what effect? It would not stimulate the production of American guano. American birds could not compete with the proper labor of birds in debauched and priest-ridden Central America. I am not quite sure as to what I mean, or why it is not so, or what is which, but the man who speaks to the contrary is a hell-hound, and bribed by British gold.

H. O.

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PARAPHRASES OF THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES VOYSEY, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—Ten Cents (New Edition).

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no slier, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution" Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath", by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education", by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, contains in full the Call for the Cincinnati Convention of the "National Reform Association," which proposes to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution,—the list of its most prominent supporters,—and a full exposure of the dangerous and revolutionary character of the movement. PRICE—Single copies, Five Cents; Twelve copies, Fifty Cents.

Also, The Bible Argument Against Woman Suffrage, a pungent pamphlet by A. J. GROVER, is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

Address, THE INDEX,

Drawer 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

BACK NUMBERS

OF

THE RADICAL

FOR SALE CHEAP.

Parties sending to my address One Dollar or more, will receive liberal packages, according to the amount.

Address

S. H. MORSE,

198-19

25 BROADFIELD ST., Boston, Mass.

F. J. SCOTT,

J. H. STOPPLET,

ARCHITECTS,

78 MADISON STREET (Near Boody House), TOLEDO.
[180-181]

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy,

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY IN ST. LOUIS, MO.

It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of Speculative Philosophy in all its departments.

Terms of Subscription.

Two dollars per volume; single number, 50 cents. Vols. I and II, bound in one volume in muslin, will be sent post-paid by mail for $5.00.

Vol. III, Vol. IV, and Vol. V. in muslin, $3.00 each.

All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor,

WM. T. HARRIS,

110-161eow.

Box 2398, St. Louis, Mo.

Guns for the People.

Breech-Loading Double Guns, $40 to $300. Double-Barrel Shot-Guns, $25 to $150. Single Guns, $3 to $20. Breech-loading and Repeating Rifles, $20 to $100. Revolvers $5 to $25. Pistols, 75c. to $5. SEND STAMP FOR PRICE-LIST TO GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, P. O. Box 1279, Pittsburgh, Pa.

N. B.—Army Guns, Revolvers, etc., bought or traded for.

[187-187eow]

THE EXAMINER.—A limited number of Nos. 1, 2, 4, and 5 will be sent post-paid—the four numbers for 50 cents. Nos. 1, 3, and 5 for 40 cents. Nos. 1 and 3 for 30 cents. No. 1 for 10 cents. What remain of full sets are reserved for binding. Zion's Herald says:—"The boldest heretic of today." The Independent says:—"The most pronounced radical in the land." The Chicago Post says:—"Equal to the utterances of Theodore Parker." Address THE EXAMINER, Winnetka, Ill., where the numbers for sale remain. [186-187]

ENGLISH AND FRENCH

FAMILY AND DAY SCHOOL.

87 W. Seventh Street, Cincinnati.

MISS O. B. NOURSE will re-open her SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES AND CHILDREN, Monday, Sept. 23. Her address during the summer will be No. 22 Dene St., Boston, and from Sept. 1 as above. [185-185]

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

Capital, $100,000.

Shares, $100.

OFFICERS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
P. H. BATESON,
A. B. MACOMBER.

President.
Vice President.
Secretary.
Treasurer.

DIRECTORS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
A. E. BUTTS, New York, N. Y.
RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Toledo, O.
A. B. MACOMBER, " "
CALVIN CONE, " "
EDWARD BISSELL, " "
P. H. BATESON, " "

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo, O.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	" "	Fifteen "	1,500
C. CONE,	" "	" "	1,000
EDWARD BISSELL,	" "	" "	1,500
P. H. ABBOT,	" "	Forty "	4,000
H. L. HOLLOWELL,	" "	Ten "	1,000
GUIDO MARK,	" "	" "	1,000
P. H. BATESON,	" "	" "	1,000
E. P. BARNETT,	" "	Three "	300
H. E. HOWE,	" "	" "	800
W. C. FINE,	" "	" "	800
J. M. RICHIE,	" "	" "	800
V. KERN,	" "	" "	800
ALANSON WOOD,	" "	" "	800
WILLIAM KRAUS,	" "	Five "	500
J. G. HOLZWAUTH,	" "	One "	100
JOS. E. MARK,	" "	" "	100
C. ACHARD,	New York, N. Y.,	Thirty "	3,000
A. E. BUTTS,	New York, N. Y.,	" "	300
T. W. HIGGINSON,	New York, N. Y.,	" "	300
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin, Pa.,	Two "	200
W. HIGGINSON,	Cincinnati, O.,	Five "	500
W. HIGGINSON,	Cincinnati, O.,	One "	100
MISS A. HALL,	Northampton, Mass.,	" "	100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Tonica, Ill.,	" "	100
J. BRIDGEMAN,	Painesville, Ohio,	" "	100
CARL FOST,	Monroe, Mich.,	Three "	300
HENRY MILLER,	Sacramento, Cal.,	Five "	500
L. R. SUNDERLAND,	Quincy, Mass.,	One "	100
J. L. WHITING,	Boston, N. H.,	" "	100
LOUIS BRISTOL,	Croydon, N. H.,	" "	100
J. E. SUTTON,	Olatche, Kan.,	" "	100
SAR. T. DUNN,	" "	" "	100
J. M. HADLEY,	" "	" "	100
S. L. HILL,	Florence, Mass.,	Two "	200
W. H. SPENCER,	Haverhill, Mass.,	Two "	200
JOS. F. BARNETT,	Boston, Mass.,	" "	200
E. W. WEIR,	La Grange, Ind.,	Five "	500
FRANK PRATHER,	Wellesville, Mass.,	One "	100
E. F. DENSMORE,	New York, N. Y.,	Two "	200
J. P. BUCKENSON,	Middlefield, Ct.,	Fourteen "	1,400
W. J. POTTER,	New Bedford, Mass.,	Three "	300
G. C. GLAZIER,	Kendallville, Ind.,	" "	300
W. C. GARNETT,	Boston, Mass.,	" "	300
MISS M. C. PERKINS,	" "	One "	100
MRS. S. EMMERSON,	Dover, N. H.,	" "	100
MISS E. EMMERSON,	" "	" "	100
W. H. DOWDES,	Birmingham, Ct.,	" "	100
S. B. SMITH,	Lansing, Mich.,	" "	100
R. B. SMITH,	Warren, Pa.,	" "	100
W. C. RUSSEL,	Ithaca, N. Y.,	" "	100
WM. CLARKE,	Toledo, O.,	Three "	300
C. L. SMITH,	" "	One "	100
J. N. LYMAN,	Cincinnati, O.,	Twenty "	2,000
L. G. FELCH,	Monroe Centre, Pa.,	One "	100
A. FOLSON,	Boston, Mass.,	Three "	300
L. O. BARR,	Colebrook, Conn.,	One "	100
S. E. SEWALL,	Boston, Mass.,	Five "	500
ELIZAB. WRIGHT,	" "	" "	500
E. B. WARD,	Detroit, Mich.,	Twenty "	2,000
A. D. WILT,	Dayton, O.,	One "	100
S. S. BONES,	Kokook, Iowa,	" "	100
WM. JONES,	Peaskehill, N. Y.,	" "	100
" "	Oskaloosa, Iowa,	" "	100
" "	Dover, N. H.,	" "	100
S. H. DAME,	" "	" "	100
J. H. YORK,	" "	" "	100
JOS. HAYES,	" "	" "	100
G. P. FOLSON,	" "	" "	100
"A FRIEND,"	" "	" "	100
MRS. H. E. PERKINS,	Boston, Mass.,	Two "	200
"A FRIEND,"	Orange, N. J.,	One "	100
WILLIAM GREENE,	Lowell, Mass.,	" "	100
D. B. STEEDMAN,	Brattleboro, Vt.,	" "	100
MRS. F. W. CHRISTIAN,	New York, N. Y.,	" "	100
C. W. FARROT,	Kelley's Island, O.,	Two "	200
EDW. M. DAVIS,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	One "	100
MRS. LUCRETIA MOTT,	" "	" "	100
MISS M. A. WRIGHT,	Jersey City, N. J.,	" "	100
A. S. BROWN,	Worcester, Mass.,	" "	100
EDWIN BROWN,	" "	" "	100
R. P. HOLLOWELL,	Boston, Mass.,	Five "	500
BENJ. RODMAN,	New Bedford, Mass.,	Three "	300
H. B. CLARKE,	" "	" "	300
" "	" "	" "	300
FRANK J. SCOTT,	Toledo, O.,	Six "	600
" "	" "	Ten "	1,000
M. L. HOLDBROOK,	New York, N. Y.,	One "	100
W. H. BOUTWORTH,	" "	" "	100
" "	" "	" "	100
HENRY H. RICHARDSON,	" "	Two "	200
E. G. BURNETT,	Webster, Mass.,	" "	300
J. E. FOLLETT,	Winona, Minn.,	One "	100
JOS. WARRASSE,	Newton, N. J.,	" "	100
" "	" "	" "	100
T. M. LAMB,	Worcester, Mass.,	" "	100
W. H. DYER,	Prarie du Chien, Wis.,	" "	100
W. H. FALDING,	Duluth, Minn.,	" "	100
LOUIS BELMONT,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	Two "	200
LEWIS KURTZ,	Angusta, Kan.,	One "	100
SAM'L WARRASSE,	La Fayette, N. J.,	" "	100
W. L. RATHS,	Amesbury, Mass.,	" "	100
W. BROWN,	Boston, Mass.,	" "	100
C. H. BORSCH,	Dover, N. H.,	Two "	200
MISS I. THOMPSON,	" "	One "	100
BENJ. HOLLOWELL,	Sandy Spring, Md.,	" "	100
MRS. M. R. VAN BENSSELAER,	N. Y. City,	" "	100
R. B. STONE,	Penn.,	" "	100
WM. ROTH,	Warten, Mass.,	Two "	200
" "	" "	" "	200
J. WHITAKER,	New Bedford, Mass.,	Five "	500
" "	Kerhonkson, N. Y.,	One "	100
S. H. BOWEN,	Boston Highlands, Mass.,	Two "	200
MRS. R. D. FRANCIS,	New York, N. Y.,	One "	100
CHAS. BONNALL,	Salem, O.,	" "	100
G. H. BRIGGS,	Amesbury, Mass.,	Two "	200
J. T. CLARSON,	" "	" "	200
C. W. NEWTON,	Castleton, Ill.,	One "	100
HENRY BROWN,	Toledo, O.,	Two "	200
OTTO KLEIN,	" "	" "	100
H. G. NEUBERT,	" "	Two "	200
A. BURNETT,	" "	One "	100
" "	" "	" "	100
TOLEDO PRINTING Co., Toledo, O.,	Detroit, Mich.,	Thirty "	3,000
T. K. PUGH,	Westminster, Ct.,	Thirty "	3,000
" "	" "	Two "	200

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 22 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Weston super Mare, Eng.
Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Send $3.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

New Tracts!

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition.

FIRST SERIES.....No. 1 to No. 30

SECOND SERIES.....No. 31 to No. 60

Either Series, 30 Cents; Both, 50 Cents.

Address CHAS. E. WHIPPLE,
[28-28] 19 PINECKY ST., BOSTON.

GIVEN AWAY

TO ANY BOOK AGENT,

A $5.00 GREENBACK

AND A SPECIMEN OF THE

GREAT INDUSTRIES

OF THE UNITED STATES.

1800 PAGES AND 500 ENGRAVINGS.

PRINTED IN ENGLISH AND GERMAN.

Written by 30 Eminent Authors, including Horace Greeley and John B. Gough.

We want Agents in every town to solicit orders for this work, on liberal terms. It sells to all classes, and no library should be without it. It is a complete history of all branches of industry, processes of manufacture, etc. No like work ever before published. One agent sold 138 in eight days, another 303 in two weeks. An early application will secure a choice in territory. Full particulars and terms will be sent free, with a specimen of this Great Work, and a $5 Greenback.

J. B. BURR & HYDE, Hartford, Conn.

SALESMEN WANTED.—I wish to employ as Commercial Travellers three young men of good character, industrious habits and fair address. Must be hearty radicals and glad to devote spare time to canvassing for THE INDEX. State particulars as to experience, references and expectations. Address A. K. BUTTS,
Care Lock Box 38,
Toledo, Ohio.

HALL'S
MAGIC SHADE FIXTURES!

An ingenious arrangement by which a Shade may be rolled down from the top, or raised from the bottom of the Window, or both, as may be desired; thus securing PERFECT VENTILATION, GOOD LIGHT, and at the same time COMPLETE PRIVACY in the room.

They are an admirable and cheap substitute for Inside Blinds.

Are easily attached to Shades now in use. Are especially adapted for Office and Store Windows.

For sale by dealers in shades generally.

MANUFACTURED BY THE

CHICAGO CURTAIN FIXTURE COMPANY.

101 WEST LAKE ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

[1871]

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 10) will be sent postpaid on receipt of sixty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Harvey, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word;") "Lecture on the Bible" by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism" by F. E. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution" by Rev. A. B. BRADFORD; "The Sabbath" by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. ABBOT. This series contains in the aggregate over two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter. Address THE INDEX, Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

FOR ENGLISH AND AMERICAN BOOKS
of all kinds, send to J. F. HUGGLES, Bronson, Mich.
[181eow]

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 7, 1872.

WHOLE No. 141.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ARNOT, Editor.
OTAVIUS BROOKS PROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLLOWELL, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, REV. CHARLES VOYSEY (England), PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), REV. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.
F. H. BATESON, Business Agent.

[For THE INDEX.]

The Religion of the Heart.

REPORT OF A LECTURE IN THE HORTICULTURAL HALL COURSE, BOSTON, FOR 1871.

BY THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON.

It is said that the late Dr. Lyman Beecher, after reading the life of Bishop Heber, expressed great doubts, in presence of his children, as to whether the good Bishop was a Christian, but added that he probably had "natural virtues." According to his son, Henry Ward, who tells the story, Dr. Beecher pronounced the words in this way—"natural virtuos," which certainly makes the phrase more vigorous.

I must say that, if this be so, I desire to be counted of the party of Bishop Heber. Natural virtues are the only virtues I believe in, and constitute the only religion I have ever in the slightest degree experienced or tested or understood. All that is not natural virtue, so far as I have been able to learn, is artificial virtue—something got up insincerely, or else honestly misconceived and misnamed. For if the virtue be genuine, it must be natural, however you name it or train it. The choicest rose or geranium, the bright consummate blossom yielded after years of culture, is still a natural flower, as distinct from the artificial; as much so as the chickweed that timidly opens, even on winter mornings, between the chinks of the pavement in city streets. The deliberate virtue of a human being is still as essentially natural virtue as the most casual blossom of good impulse in the most neglected heart.

I am aware that to many persons Nature seems to have as little to do with the health of the soul, as it was once thought to be concerned in bodily health. It would have been hard to convince our grandparents that it was the reserved forces of Nature which cured disease. They thought it was done by the medicine. It is now seen that those were days of ignorance, and that the only value of medicine is to help Nature to act. Medical science has got beyond that stage, but religion has not. Even the liberal Dr. Channing lamented in his later years that he had all his life been trying to attain virtue by some other means than virtue itself. To suppose that the source of virtue lies outside the soul, is a book or teacher, is to look for the source of health in the medicine-chest. Modern physicians of the body have grown wiser, and soul-physicians must grow wiser too.

Now the soil in which natural virtues grow is the heart. As the intellect must deal with theology, which is a science, so the heart must deal with religion, which is a feeling. To keep one's heart in sympathy with the parental spirit which pervades the universe, and with all the living things that people it,—this is the religion of the heart. It is called by Epictetus, "being a worthy member of that great city, the universe, full of beloved ones, divine and human, by nature endeared to each other." It is called by Jesus, "loving God with all one's heart and soul and strength, and one's neighbor as one's self." Here lies the principle of health in the heart. No child is born so morally diseased that it does not, consciously or unconsciously, desire something to love. For its diseases it may need a whole medicine-chest of examples and whole books of precepts; but from beginning to end you must take for granted this fundamental principle of its nature—this natural impulse of love.

I hold that religion is a natural instinct in the human heart—that we seek something to love as spontaneously as we seek something to eat, though in either case the appetite may become enfeebled or morbid when fed with narcotics or poisons. I hold that we no more need to be taught religion than a child needs to be taught love to its mother; while in both cases the emotion needs guiding, directing, modulating, lest it be stunted, misguided, or stimulated to excess.

Of this religion of the heart I should therefore say, in the first place, that it is a live, vital, indigenous thing, valuable only as it is genuine where found.

A friend of mine went into a superb house the other day, and was delighted with the first sight of a luxuriant ivy, trained upon the parlor walls. With all her own skill and care, she never had succeeded in rearing such an ivy. She turned with delight to her hostess, and said, "How beautiful!" "Is it not perfect?" said the triumphant possessor, and added with meek pride, "It came all the way from Paris!" It was artificial!

The charm all vanished at the word. The humblest sprig of ivy thrusting up its little germ in the broken tumbler of an Irish shanty, became suddenly an incalculable treasure beside this. And when I have stood in superb churches, sometimes, and have heard a multitude of children reciting the dogmas they have learned in Sunday school, and have been amazed at the way in which all the cardinal virtues seemed enthroned and glorified at last, I have seemed to hear a proud voice saying, "Is it not perfect? It came all the way from Jerusalem."

Religion, to be interesting or beautiful, must grow from within. The poorest virtue that a man develops genuinely within himself, like a flower in a cottage window, is better than that which is imported and artificial. Honor among thieves, and the impulse that makes a burglar risk liberty and life to rescue his mistress from jail; the fidelity of the poor little outcast street-boy, drifting toward the prison and the gallows, but ready to be trampled to death by horses rather than leave his little sister beneath their feet—how the heart responds in sympathy to things like these! And I suspect that the most heroic and perfect self-devotion of the noblest saint differs in degree only, not in kind, from these way-side virtues.

For each one must live his own life and work out his own salvation. Each has his own problem, and in its detailed solution no one can directly aid. No example is ever precisely applicable, and nothing but the spirit of another's good deed can help yours. Neither Paul nor Luther ever stood precisely where you stand to-day. Jesus himself was never tested by the duties of husband, father, employer, employee, citizen, soldier. Still more obviously, among all the complex situations of a woman's life, not one ever reached him save through the eyes of a man. When any one of these duties perplexes you, therefore, you can derive from him no direct counsel, any more than a daisy, in developing as a daisy, can derive counsel from a rose. The work cannot change hands. The humblest blossom must unfold by its own laws, and all that it has in common with the rose is the general law of growth—the religion of the flower's heart. Neglect this inward religion, cease to be yourself, cultivate secondary and imitative virtues, and when you most need strength you will find only a habit of dependence and imitation in its place. Secondly, the religion of the heart is an essentially positive thing, with nothing that is merely negative about it.

The heart is positive and affirmative, whatever else is. Time and experience have proved that a man's own nature develops many things for which it was once supposed that he must sit at the feet of some special teacher. It used to be said, for instance, that the proper method of reasoning was only first discovered by Lord Bacon, under the name of "Induction." But it is now generally admitted that the relative importance of Lord Bacon has been exaggerated, and that science is, as Huxley well says, "only trained and organized common sense," nor does the method by which a lady, discovering a stain of a peculiar kind upon her dress, concludes that somebody has upset the inkstand thereon, differ in any way from that by which Adams and Leverrier discovered a new planet.

Now there has been just this sort of underrating of the positive capabilities of the heart. It used to be held that Jesus taught it as a wholly new proposition that we should love one another, when it turns out that this love appeared spontaneously in the heart of every parent and child since the world began, and that no gospel of love can be more than the trained and organized instinct of the heart.

I am always amazed at those unbelievers whom nothing but chapter and verse—and scarcely even these—can convince that any one before Jesus taught forgiveness and the love of enemies. No doubt it is easy to meet such persons on the ground of facts, and to quote texts from non-Christian writers to show the facts. But how much more easily they learn this truth in their own nurseries by watching their own children. When your little girl kisses away the tears of the brother who yesterday struck her, shares with him her sweetmeats, and weeps herself if he is punished, then you have at first hand the original gospel of love, of which all the books give only the second edition. Nay, when Jesus said of little children, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven," he traced back his own religious teachings to their source in the natural human heart.

And thirdly, it is the religion of the heart which chiefly gives joy. In its purest type it is so direct an outgrowth of the individual nature that it remembers no beginning of its happiness, and finds no end. I remember a young maiden whom I should have named before almost any other as a type of this spontaneous natural religion. Once during a revival, she went into the church where a companion was experiencing religion and sat down near the door. The revivalist—a rough, noisy, illiterate man—was going the rounds of his converts, questioning them. "Well, my daughter," he said abruptly to this young girl, "has the Lord blessed you?" "Yes, sir," she answered, looking up with wondering eyes, "he has always blessed me." The preacher hesitated, looked puzzled and passed on. There was no place in his machinery for one to whom the joy of the Lord had come even in her cradle.

How much mutual pity there is in the world! I observe that, while the believers in Natural Religion are pitying Evangelical Christians for the want of a hearty and cheerful faith, these worthy church members are also pitying them in return. The eloquent Roman Catholic writer, Digby, mourns the sadness of Protestants; good President Porter, of Yale College, laments the same quality in the leading writers of the day. "Among the writers of eminent genius now living who are influenced by the Pagan spirit," thus he describes them,—"there is not one who does not give token of the blight of depression which the cheerfulness and fervor of a better hope would remove." It escapes the notice of both these good men that it is they and such as they who have given some reason for the sadness of heretics. The Yale professors would have been sad when Mr. Digby's church still used thumb-screws and the rack; and I once had a visit from a young teacher in Yale College who honestly confessed that he dared not avow his religious opinions, as it would cost him his daily bread. So far as heresy still implies persecution, it may well imply sadness; but, persecution apart, heresy seems to me the most joyous thing I know. Think of the very writers whom President Porter seems to have in mind; think of Emerson, with the serene smile that takes twenty years from his age; think of Thoreau, with his "inexpressible gratitude for the gift of his life;" think of the ceaseless hymn of gratitude that rolled up to heaven in Theodore Parker's prayers; think of Garrison, never for one instant faltering in the cheerful faith that slavery would yet be ended, though State and Church might sustain it. Then think, on the other side, of the unspeakable gloom that must descend on the soul of every man who consistently believes in an endless hell, and choose between them. As a general rule, when I see a man who has come out from the bondage of church creeds, I read it in his face by the joy. And show me, if you can, a clergyman who habitually carries sunshine in his face, and who has not, at some time, been accused of heresy!

It seems to me that no people were ever so beset with criticism, and from diametrically opposite directions, as we simple believers in Natural Religion. We are charged with sadness and with levity; with too much head and with setting a too sentimental value upon the heart; with too much secularism, or attention to this world, and with a merely abstract religion that has no efficacy in this world at all; with too much zeal when we distribute tracts, and with too much indifference when we do not take that trouble. That we are thus systematically denounced for opposite and incompatible faults, is certainly an indication that we keep the golden mean.

And yet again, the religion of the heart gives strength. Of course it does, if it is genuine and good. Grandly does the wise old theologian say, "There is a weakness and impotency in all evil, but a masculine strength and vigor in all goodness; and therefore, doubtless, the highest good is the strongest thing in the world." To those who have this faith, how weak sound the little evils of those who shut their eyes to all types of virtue except those within their own little church! I read the other day the report of a sermon by one of the most popular of the rising clergymen in Boston, serenely setting aside "Free Religion" as "a cold, spiritless, tame affair," without "vitality." "The religion that was preached in Horticultural Hall went to pieces down in North street," he said. "There was no converting power in such a religion; there was no muscle in it."

Now I wish well to any preacher who, in spite of the flatteries that usually enfeeble those of his profession, shows manhood in his own way. But why impeach the manhood of others? When I hear this singular complaint of the want of vitality in Free Religion, I ask myself what kind of religion it was that planted itself down in the Liberator office, and began single-handed a forty years' grapple with slavery. What kind of religion was it that in Theodore Parker's study gave to William Craft a wedded wife and a sword to defend her, when Park Street Church could offer him nothing but a negro-pew? One must have come very late into the anti-slavery movement not to know that its strength and main reliance lay always in that Old Guard of Abolitionists whom the churches had cast out, and who had grimly excommunicated the churches in return. When this preacher talks about carrying religion into North street, I remember those men whose religion reached even to the North Star! And in the simple work of reaching the poor and criminals in cities—a work requiring but trivial moral muscle compared with the work of standing against all Church and State in defence of the slave—even there it is heresy in this very city of Boston, which has founded the Ministry at Large and reached those who needed it. John Augustus, who bailed out every friendless criminal in the Boston police court, year after year, and so influenced them that only one bail-bond was ever forfeited in the process; John T. Sargent, who gave his life to city missions, and only left them when he was required to be a missionary and a bigot too; Theodore Parker, who knew the "perishing classes" so well that it was he who baptized them by that name—I remember the work of all these men, and when I hear a younger preacher talk about want of "vitality" and want of "muscle" in religion, it affects me as when my young lieutenants in the field used to plan how they would teach strategy to Grant and Sherman.

As I take it, the religion of the heart makes the especial claim of being able to meet the hearts most degraded. All personal power over criminals, all progress in prison discipline, implies the presence of abounding heart. Why can you so often reach the most degraded sinner through the memory of his mother? Because it is to that name that his heart-strings are anchored. But a man who is saturated with a genial and hopeful faith may have more control over the criminal than the man's mother, if that mother be a bigot. But for betraying confidence, I could tell you of hardened offenders who had withstood law and gospel, home and mother, and yet were brought back to usefulness and virtue by the patient care of heretics whom every church would have disowned. I have seen something of degraded humanity, black and white, North and South, and my belief is unflinching that creed is nothing, catechism and scripture nothing, compared to faith in the human heart. You must believe that under the utmost disguise of wickedness the heart still feebly beats. You must restore a criminal, as you would a man half-drowned, by warming him back to life.

Did you ever think what a singular satire was passed by the President of the United States, a few years since, on our church membership and clergy? He wished to enter on a new and humane Indian policy, and to find a body of men who could be trusted to enforce it. He looked over the land, laden with churches, full of ordained clergymen, organized into a vast network of dioceses, presbyteries and sects, and he found at last one little body of men and women whose religion had been held heresy from the beginning, as it was indeed a protest against all established religious forms. Here were men and women who had never sat beneath a steeple, nor sung a hymn, nor partaken of the communion, nor touched baptismal water, nor paid a dollar to a minister, nor taken any part in the vast machinery of Christendom—men whose ancestors two centuries ago were whipped and branded as non-Christian—and he chose every one of his agents from such men as these, from the people called Quakers. Not one of them betrayed his trust, but the clamor of the sects at last forced a distribution of the agencies among them all. The Society of Friends has always claimed its faith to be, in the words of one of its ablest writers, "A Religion of the Heart," and this action of President Grant's was an unconscious national tribute to the power of that religion.

Quakerism has undoubtedly complicated this simple creed by forms and traditions and a ritual of its own. But many of us were brought up in this religion of the heart, pure and simple, and in advocating it are only urging the faith which was our birthright. We did not work it out for ourselves through terrible doubts and struggles, but grew up as naturally as the grass beneath the dew. We never knew or had reason to seek the way to any other. That any book or any teacher could be paramount to the Inward Light, we were never told. We were taught that we ought to seek all light we could from books and teachers; but when, after deliberate conviction, anything appeared right to us, we were taught that we ought to do it, though every book or teacher in the world should say nay. Later we found these views unfashionable in the churches, but found that these churches could offer us no examples more admirable than were already associated with this simpler creed. If these organizations would not "fellowship" our parents, why should we be seriously concerned that they would not "fellowship" us?

It is a thing constantly overlooked by the timid, that we are now in the second generation of radicalism. In the last generation the great contemporary teachers, even if original thinkers, were still explicitly and vehemently Christian, as Coleridge and La Mennais. So was the science, so was the scholarship. But the teachers who educated this generation were and are outside the church. For one, if I have any manhood in me, I owe it, so far as public teachers go, to the ideas of Emerson and Parker—to examples such as were given by Garrison and Lucretia Mott. Looking back, I find every fibre of my moral nature anchored to such influences as these. I have seldom learned anything important except from those under excommunication. This being the case, it is not strange if I feel like that unconquered Norse chief who was perfectly willing to go to perdition with his heroic ancestors, but utterly refused when offered admission into heaven without them.

It is idle to compare what is now called unbelief with the unbelief of other years. Among the opponents of the church it was once the earnest opinion that religion was only an imposture, and the priesthood an unmixed evil. Now the same class would be more likely to say that religion is in itself respectable and even valuable, but that neither the priesthood nor Christianity itself can claim to monopolize it. The debate rages now not so much about the value of the article itself, as about the validity of the patent right. It is not the claim, but the exclusive claim which is in dispute.

Indeed even the monopoly is not so much disputed as ignored, which is worse. All the fierce batteries of Voltaire were only a compliment to the church; they recognized its power. It is indifference which is destruction. The mob assaults a Bastille, but a cradle, after the youngest child has outgrown it, is put away in the garret and grows dusty. The most dangerous opponents of the church are those who treat it as a cradle; who admit that it is good for those who need it, to be baptized or confirmed, to join the church, to go to confession, but who habitually by their action ignore those needs. There are many institutions whose fate it is, as Lecky has well said, to perish by indifference, not by controversy.

But the religion of the heart will never perish, because it is a human instinct. Between the decaying technicalities of organized religion and the rigid conditions of modern science, nothing but the religion of the heart can keep us fresh and strong. While Buckle was elaborating a theory of civilization that took in the intellect only, and claimed that humanity thrived only by the brains of its leaders, while their hearts made no difference, this nation was drifting into a war in which the one thing that gave us confidence, more than armies, more than statesmanship, was the good patriotic heart of Abraham Lincoln.

While that beat, men trusted the government and one another, because they trusted him. I suppose there was hardly a church in the land which, had he honestly told his creed, would have received him. A great statesman he was not, for he followed instead of leading the thought of the nation. But he was so single-minded, and his sympathies were so true, that it was as if we had inaugurated a little child. A nation needs, after all, to trust the heart of its ruler, and this truth we discovered through Lincoln.

And we must remember finally that, while the theology of the head separates men, the religion of the heart unites them. When a man falls fainting in the streets on Sunday, the passers-by from the most hostile churches stop to work together for his restoration. When your house burns, you ask no certificate of baptism from the fireman who rescues your child. When war rages, you do not turn away a recruit because the church militant has assigned him a theological uniform unlike your own. The New Zealand converts told the English missionaries that, unless they gave up their ikiranga tuara or "back-to-back religion," their disciples would relapse: "heathenism in love," they said, "is better than Christianity without it." The heart alone unites. We are rapidly finding out that the different religions of the world are but larger sects, and that the barrier which separates Christian from Jew or Buddhist is really no more important than that which once held Presbyterian and Baptist apart. You and I may not live to see it, but I believe that there will yet be held in some one of the world's great cathedrals an Ecumenical Council, not of the little Roman Catholic Church alone, but of the human race itself, drawn together by the Natural Religion of humanity, the universal brotherhood of the heart. There the Hindu "Brahmo Samaj" will meet the Jewish reformers of America, with Christians reforming and reformed. Freed from the petty technicalities of local prejudice, such a council may compile out of all sacred books a World's Liturgy, and prepare noble plans of usefulness for the Brotherhood of Man. A church thus formed would be a Holy Church indeed—the mother of the coming millions of the human race. And of her it could be said, what is true of no existing church—

"All saying but what God saith
To her is but vain breath:
She is more strong than Death,
Being strong as Love."

THE SCHOOL QUESTION IN ENGLAND.

[From the New York Nation.]

The working of the new School Law in England continues to furnish curious and instructive illustrations of the difficulties of having children taught in a country in which there is not only a defective appreciation of the importance of popular education, but a decided preference on the part of a considerable portion of the religious world for ignorance over knowledge, unless the knowledge is accompanied with certain religious beliefs. The law leaves it optional with the inhabitants of each district whether they will avail themselves of its provisions, and set the educational machinery in motion or not; and accordingly we find that, out of fourteen thousand country parishes, only one hundred and fourteen had when the last returns were made during the past winter, elected school boards, and out of the two hundred boroughs only ninety-six; but, then, it must be admitted that half a dozen of the great towns, which at once availed themselves of the act, contain a third of the population of the whole kingdom. In the country parishes the poor man who has children to educate finds himself involved in a confusing struggle. If the Episcopal clergyman of the parish can command a majority of the votes of the rate-payers, as in a large number of cases he can, and the parish elects a school board, the schools and schoolmasters are certain to be in the hands of the dominant party, and the school boards are by no means unimportant bodies. They not only appoint the teachers, but they fix the amount of the school tax, and have power to borrow money, and buy and hold real estate, and can, if they please, confine the teaching to secular subjects wholly, or order religious instruction to be administered, under the conditions prescribed by the act—that is, the time at which it is to be given must be posted up, so that children who do not want it may be able to absent themselves. If the religious instruction be ordered and be administered by teachers appointed by the clergy, the Dissenters and "Secularists" fight the school board with all their might, on the ground that they are taxed either to pay for the teaching of doctrines of which they do not approve, or for religious teaching administered by persons whom they have had no hand in choosing. As a matter of fact, it is this, or something like this, which has come to pass in nearly all the country parishes in which the law is working. The school boards have fallen into the hands of the parson and his friends, and he has his own way nearly as fully as in the olden time. But as the clergy have almost everywhere the possession of the old schools they not unnaturally oppose altogether the election of boards under the new law.

In the large cities, on the other hand, where the Dissenters and Secularists are in a large majority, and counted positively on having the control, something else has happened, and something which nobody expected. The cumulative variety of proportional representation was inserted in the new law with the view of giving minorities a fair representation in the school boards. In Manchester and Birmingham, however, the minority, being dexterous and well organized and united, actually succeeded, by skillfully concentrating their votes, in securing a majority on the boards; and thus will for three years to come control the educational system of the district, or, in other words, will do all the things which make the system odious to the majority, and do as few as possible of those which make it desirable.

The fight over the "compulsory clause" is nearly as deadly as that over the "conscience clause," as the provision with regard to religious instruction is called. Parliament refused to make attendance at the schools compulsory, as the Radicals would have desired, but gave the school boards power to do so if they pleased. Now, one of the belligerent parties is opposed to the exercise of this power by the boards. Those who demand religious instruction at the district schools are opposed to having children compelled to attend schools in which no such instruction is given, because it deprives them of all chance of going to any other. On the other hand, the great body of the workingmen, and indeed nearly the whole of the secular-teaching party, insist upon it that, without the existence and exercise of the power of compelling attendance, the schools, in the worst districts especially, will be well-nigh useless. The more ignorant parents are, the less disposed will they be to sacrifice their children's earnings in order to let them attend, and the less importance will they attach to their attendance; and besides this, whatever hostility to the schools exists in any district, on the part of the clergy or others, will find expression more frequently in dissuading parents from sending their children than in any other way. On these two points mainly, but chiefly on the question of religious instruction, the two opposing parties are making preparations, under the lead respectively of two organizations—one called the National Educational Union, the other the National Educational League—for what promises to be one of the most exciting contests in English history, because both sides feel that its results, whatever they may be, will seriously affect other things than popular education.

Should the friends of secular instruction solely succeed in carrying their points—that is, should they succeed in having the communication of religious instruction by the teacher in school hours completely prohibited and attendance made compulsory—it would either completely release the schools from the control or influence of the clergy, or deprive the clergy of all interest in them; and make the maintenance of church schools a matter of great and increasing difficulty. No matter what might be the effect of this on the faith of either children or parents, it would unquestionably take away from the country parsons one great source of their influence with the country population, and one of the strongest reasons for the connection of the church with the state. The English clergyman would have to change greatly in many ways to make him take any part in working an organization which set aside his own teaching as of secondary importance, and the school boards would therefore pass gradually but steadily under the control either of Dissenters or sceptics; either of which results would be a serious blow to the security of the church establishment, already greatly weakened by the destruction of the sister organization in Ireland. When this is looked at, too, in connection with the rapid spread of the movement in favor of higher wages and greater personal independence among the agricultural laborers—a movement which has already assumed formidable proportions, and which, though originated by a clergyman, Canon Girdlestone, has thus far met with neither sympathy nor encouragement from the clergy in general, who feel themselves to be the natural allies of the farmers and landlords—it will be seen that the school question is but part of a very large social question.

It is, however, part of a religious question as well. There is no disguising the fact that behind the hostility to religious teaching in the schools there is a very considerable amount of hostility to all religious teaching, and that to the movement against it there is engaged a body of men, such as Huxley and Tyndall and Harrison, to whom in influence and ability we have no corresponding class here. They are as vehemently opposed to the "Bible in the schools" as the Catholics are here, but for a very different reason. They do not seek to substitute for such religious teaching as the Protestant clergy would give other religious teaching of their own; they seek a reorganization of society on a scientific basis purely, and would deny to religion all recognition in laws or institutions, leaving as its sole function the gratification of individual tastes, like poetry or music. For the creation and diffusion of scientific habits of thought there is, of course, no way so sure as the presentation of life and its problems to the young in a scientific aspect purely; and the control of the schools is therefore to them one of the most important objects of their mission, and in this mission a very large number of them begin to display an earnestness, one might almost say fanaticism, which has long been extinct among most religious sects. How it is that their attempt to exclude religious instruction from the schools excites so much more alarm in the religious world in England than it excites, or would excite, here, is explained by the fact that, the state in England having for a thousand years undertaken to teach religion itself, the exclusion of its functionaries from all share in the work of education, and the relegation of the doctrines of which it has so long guaranteed the truth to the category of things indifferent, naturally assumes the proportions of a revolution. In this country, long familiarity with the spectacle of the state acting merely as the agent of the community in a small number of purely mundane affairs, has made its exclusion from the work of religious instruction a familiar and harmless arrangement, without special significance.

THE CLOUD NO BIGGER THAN A MAN'S HAND.

[From the Chronicle and Herald, Elmwood, Illinois, Aug. 8.]

Some twelve years ago a movement was inaugurated, in an obscure way, which is destined to shake the country in all its length and breadth with fierce discussion, and, if successful, to revolutionize the American government. We refer to the scheme for securing such an amendment to the United States Constitution as shall make nominal Christianity the fundamental law of the land. Many look upon this attempt as the futile effort of a few religious fanatics. When we, in a public lecture twelve years ago, predicted a coming struggle of this kind, we were told that not a corporal's guard, outside of the Catholic church, would listen to it. Minorities have always been despised, yet every great revolution had its cradle in a corner. The beginnings of this movement were small, but it has lengthened its cords and strengthened its stakes, until to-day it is backed by a great organization, managed with consummate skill, and pushed on by able and earnest men, half Jesuit and half Crusader, who have all there is of logic in the popular religious teaching on their side. The proposition is to amend the preamble of the Constitution by naming "God as the source of all authority in civil government, Jesus Christ as ruler among the nations, and the Bible as of supreme authority;" and also "such changes in the body of the Constitution as may be necessary to give effect to these amendments in the preamble."

This is the key with which to re-open all the bloodiest pages of history! Let those who think the scheme can easily be snuffed out, remember that ten men, determined on their point, can outdo a hundred who languidly and dividedly oppose. Then let them look at the material of the National Amendment Association. The President is Wm. Strong, Judge of the United States Supreme Court. Among the Vice-Presidents are governors and ex-governors, and a long and splendid line of D.D.s and scholars, such as Bishops Simpson, McIlvaine, Huntington, Edwards, etc., including, of course, that veteran crusader, Dr. Blanchard, of Wheaton College. A great convention was held in Cincinnati, last January, to perfect the organization, which aims first at securing the co-operation of the clergy, then the churches, and lastly the outside world.

The Independent and the Christian Union oppose it, while the Advance is mildly nowhere; but the denominational journals are falling into line, and we venture the prediction that the great bulk of the sects and sectarian papers will be drawn into this to them plausible attempt to base civil government, once more, on a religious creed. Two of the ablest men of the liberal sects, Dr. Miner, Universalist, and Dr. Mayo, Unitarian, are laboring for it with might and main. A fund of $100,000 is being raised to circulate documents among the churches, and to push on the work. The attempt will not be abandoned without a long and bitter struggle. Its projectors have money, brains, position, pertinacity and fanatical zeal. They appeal to the civil law, because they dare not trust what they call God's truth with free consciences, free speech, and equal rights.

"Fore-warned is fore-armed." Is there enough of the spirit of the Declaration of Independence extant to overwhelm this movement? We think so, but it will not be without a discussion that will shake every political and religious organization in the nation. The success of the scheme would disfranchise millions of the wisest and best men in the land.

A Free Republic, or a Theocracy?—that is the question.

A clergyman in New York, only a few days since, explained that "science must stop or religion cannot go on." The Newark Advertiser suggests that he stop, and allows some wiser teacher to occupy the pulpit.

A juvenile Georgian, petitioning for "our daily bread" previous to retiring, was interrupted by his younger brother, who whispered, "Ask for cake, Johnny! ask for cake!"

An old Baptist minister enforced the necessity of difference of opinion by this argument:—"Now, if everybody had been of my opinion, everybody would have wanted my wife." One of the deacons who sat just behind him responded: "Yes, and if everybody were of my opinion, nobody would have had her."

The committee of the Young Men's Christian Association of Chicago have placed twenty boxes and racks for tracts and illustrated papers in the different passenger depots. In a little over two months they have thus circulated 185,000 pages of tracts and 4000 copies of tracts.

An Illinois minister reproved a party of lads who were playing cards in church, by some timely remarks regarding the last trump.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at ODEON HALL, 31, CLAIR STREET, on Sunday mornings, at 10 o'clock. The public are invited to attend. The next meeting of the present season will be held on above, Sunday, Sept. 8.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Cash Receipts for the week ending August 31st.—R. L. Baker, $5; J. W. Millisack, 25 cts.; H. H. Rice, 25 cts.; Mary O. Giles, $2; Parker Pillsbury, $3; J. Richmond, $4; D. J. Crittenden, 50 cts.; F. B. Hinch, $1; G. N. Sears, $10; J. T. Tate, $1; M. J. Macintosh, 50 cts.; C. M. Sneed, 50 cts.; R. P. Johnson, $2; A. K. Butts, $20; Mrs. M. J. Barker, $1; Geo. Iles, 50 cts.; W. N. Finley, 50 cts.; R. E. Grunshaw, $10; C. A. Gurley, $3; Larkin T. Tufa, $1; Thomas E. Moon, 25 cts.; Fred. Deffner, 50 cts.; E. A. J. Lindsay, $1; H. G. Macgill, $2; E. Hall, 10 cts.; J. M. Hall, $1.50; Wm. Colvin, $2; Gov. Thos. Vickers, $4; E. W. Meddaugh, $20; Gabriel Crane, $1; Francis Alger, 10 cts.; Max Meyer, 50 cts.; W. N. Morse, $1; Jno. R. Porter, $1; Gen. E. Eastabrook, 50 cts.; Wm. Hamburg, $3; Chas. Shiverick, 50 cts.; Julius Mayer, $1; M. H. Brown, $2; Henry Knefel, $1; A. Schlosser, $1; Savary House, $2; Marshall Brock, $10; S. Lydiard, $10; C. D. B. Mills, $10; J. Henry Clark, $10; Mrs. J. L. Bage, $2; Orville Robinson, $1; Lafayette Alfred, $2; Jno. Davidson, 50 cts.; C. C. Collins, $2; Henry Lincoln, $2; H. Lowy, $1; T. B. Dickerson, $2; R. M. Whipple, $2; Wirt Dexter, $2; B. C. Glover, 50 cts.; Samuel Herron, $2; H. D. Stocker, $2; Dr. B. F. LaRue, $2; Jno. Rany, $2; G. W. Tinsley, $1; Justice Bragg, $1; Edward Murphy, $2; J. G. Pettit, $1; Chas. Hoag, $1; Jno. Baxter, $2; J. Town, $2; L. B. Sisson, $2; C. C. Bael, $2; D. W. Biltz, $2; A. Pollard, $2; Jno. Reynolds, $2; Andrew Rinker, $2; M. Buxton, $2; Chas. T. Jerome, $1; J. A. Lovejoy, $2; C. D. Dorr, $2; H. M. Carpenter, $2; M. W. Getchell, 50 cts.; C. W. Weeks, $2; Thomas O. Barnard, $2; W. H. Maudseld, 50 cts.; E. Southworth, $2; A. E. Johnson, $1; Mrs. S. N. Whitney, $1; Rev. H. Biabe, $1; Dr. M. Nicholson, $1; Rutgers B. Miller, $2; Henry L. White, $1; William H. Elmer, 75 cts.; A. Delahay, 50 cts.; Noah Green, $1; George A. Brady, $1; Anthony Stacy, 50 cts.; Charles Krebs, 50 cts.; A. T. Duell, 50 cts.; Paul Kropp, $2; W. Joseph, 50 cts.; John Ritter, $2; H. G. Dayton, $1; D. L. Simmons, 50 cts.; Frederick Kirby, 50 cts.; Matthew Hunter, 50 cts.; William Brown, $1; Dr. S. Weed, $1; A. F. Reddick, $1; S. Cole Hedgrove, 50 cts.; H. J. Palmer, 50 cts.; Beale Engle, 50 cts.; George A. Mayer, 50 cts.; Jno. Hefeld, 50 cts.; Adolph Deutech, 50 cts.; Carr & Kinnell, 50 cts.; Lahr House, 50 cts.; Joseph McDonough, $2; Isaac Butte, $2; Jno. T. Briggs, $1; Charles T. Burrill, $2; D. W. Wilcox, $2; Uriah Hutchings, $2; A. W. Baker, $1; Hallowell & Willis, $2; I. B. Francis, 50 cts.; E. H. Duell, 15 cts.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittance acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

N. B.—THE INDEX is payable in advance. Its friends should not be offended if the paper is stopped at the expiration of their terms as indicated by the mail-tags. We have no means of knowing whether they wish it continued or not except by the receipt or non-receipt of the subscription price.

N. B.—Please examine the ADDRESS and DATE on your INDEX mail-tag, and report at once any error in either.

N. B.—If your INDEX mail-tag is not changed within three weeks after renewing your subscription, please notify us immediately. But do not write before the expiration of that time.

N. B.—In case of any error in your mail-tag, always state the post-office at which the paper is received, and also the name just as it is now printed. Then state any desired corrections.

N. B.—Please remit by post-office money-order, by registered letter, or by draft on New York. Cheques on interior banks are liable to discount, and the term of subscriptions will be proportionally shortened in the credit.

N. B.—When writing about a former remittance, always give the date of such remittance as exactly as possible.

N. B.—Postage on THE INDEX is five cents per quarter, dating from receipt of the first number, payable in advance at the place of delivery.

RECEIVED.

THE NEW KORAN OF THE PACIFICAN FRIENDSHIP OF TEXT-Book of Turkish Reformers, in the Teaching and Example of their Esteemed Master, JAIDU MORATA. London: Geo. MANWING, 5, King William Street, Strand, 1861. 16mo. pp. 678.

THE PILGRIM'S HARP: A Choice Collection of Sacred Music adapted to all occasions of Social and Family Worship, and a convenient Hand-Book for Church Choirs. By ASA HULL, Author of "Yesty Chimes," etc. Boston: OLIVER DITSON & Co., 277 Washington Street.

THE COMMUNION OF THE SOUL WITH GOD. By FRANCIS T. WASHBURN. Boston: LEONARD C. BOWLES, 1872.

THE MANCHESTER FRIEND. August, 1872. London: F. BOWEN KITT, 5, Bishopsgate Street Without.

OLD AND NEW SEPTEMBER, 1872. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS, 143 Washington St.

LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE. September, 1872. Philadelphia: J. B. LIPPINCOTT.

THE ALDINE. September, 1872. New York: JAMES SUTTON & Co., 22 Liberty St.

BLATTES FÜR RELIGIÖSE LERNE. Juli-August, 1872. San Francisco: FR. SCHUMANN-POTT.

THE HERALD OF HEALTH. September, 1872. New York: WOOD & HOLDSBROOK, 13 & 15 Laight St.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE. September, 1872. Chicago: Mrs. M. CORA BLAND, 335 West Madison St.

THE PHARMACIAN. August, 1872. St. Louis: G. F. GOULET.

THE BELMONT FARMER. 1862. Bridgeport, Ct.: JOHN G. APTHEK, M. D.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.
The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 30, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED elsewhere, Five Hundred Shares, $50,000
THOMAS MUMFORD, New Harmony, Ind., One Share, 100
D. ATHER, Jr., Brooklyn, N. Y., " 100
Mrs L. E. BLOUNT, Evansville, Ind., " 100
—, Defiance, Ohio, " 100
J. T. BRADY, Sabetha, Kan., " 100
MAX PRAGHT, Northampton, Mass., " 100
H. BETERMANN, Cincinnati, Ohio, " 100
C. FOLSON, Zanesfield, Ohio, " 100
S. C. EASTMAN, Palmyra, Mo., " 100
J. O. MARTIN, Indianapolis, Ind., " 100
W. F. BRICKS, Boston, Mass., Two 200
HILMA COIT, Dayton, Ohio, " 100
RAUEL COIT, Supt'n Bridge, N. Y., One 100
CHARLES NASH, Worcester, Mass., Two 200
S. P. WOODARD, Livonia, Ohio, Two 200
H. A. MILLER, Osborn, Ohio, One 100
J. W. BARTLETT, Dover, N. H., " 100
OSCAR LOOS, Taylor's Falls, Minn., " 100
Mrs E. S. MILLER, Geneva, N. Y., " 100
JAS. R. STONE, Cincinnati, Ohio, " 100
D. K. INNES, " " " 100
A. TAPP, " " " 100
S. L. WILDER, " " " 100
PETER H. CLARK, " " " 100
G. K. WITHINGTON, " " " 100
J. T. SUTTON, " " " 100
WALT. F. AUSTIN, Pittsburgh, Pa., " 100
Mrs C. E. NOURSE, Cincinnati, Ohio, Two 200
JAS. FISHER, Shreveport, La., One 100
O. H. HOLTMAN, Pittsburgh, Pa., " 100
L. VON BLESINGHOFF, N. Y. City, " Five 500
W. P. CHAMBERS, Brooklyn, N. Y., One 100
TITUS L. BROWN, Binghamton, N. Y., " 100
A. McD. YOUNG, Milwaukee, Wis., " 100
G. W. PROCKHAM, " " " 100
U. T. HAWLEY, " " " 100
W. BECKER, " " " 100
Mrs. G. D. NORRIS, " " " Five 500
ROBT. C. SPENCER, " " " One 100
C. M. LAWLER, " " " " 100
E. R. LELAND, " " " " 100
Wm. BLACKMORE, Painesville, Ohio, " 100
H. B. HANNEY, Boston, Mass., " 100
O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York, N. Y., Five 500
Mrs. J. G. KINIST, Richmond, Ind., One 100
J. R. WEIST, " " " " 100
JAMES SHELDER, " " " " 100
JOHN H. POPP, " " " " 100
THOMAS DAVIS, Indianapolis, " " " 100
ALAN. MCKENNA, " " " " 100
HENRYMAN LIEBER, " " " " 100
CLEMENS VONNEGUT, " " " " 100
FRED. CHRISTMANN, " " " " 100
HENRY SCHMULL, " " " " 100
M. H. DOOLITTLE, New Bedford, Mass., " 100
M. S. BRACH, Washington, D. C., " 100
L. S. BACON, Lawrence, Kan., " 100
C. ROBINSON, " " " " 100
HENRY STAGG, St. Louis, Mo., " 100
J. C. KOONEY, " " " " Two 200
JACOB SPRINKLE, St. Joseph, Mo., One 100
E. P. HOLLOWELL, Boston, Mass., Five 500
ELIZAB. WRIGHT, " " " " 500
JAS. A. DUFES, " " " " One 100
E. S. DUTCHMAN, " " " " 100
JOHN F. MILLIS, " " " " 100
J. C. HAYNES, " " " " Three 300
O. W. PARK, " " " " One 100
FREDERICK DECK, " " " " 100
J. W. WINKLEY, " " " " 100
D. J. KING, " " " " 100
Mrs R. BOWKER, " " " " 100
"A Friend," " " " " 100
Mrs H. E. STEVENS, " " " " Two 200
M. LOOS, " " " " Two 200
HENRY N. STONE, " " " " One 100
E. S. BARROWS, Davenport, Iowa, " 100
W. W. GRANT, " " " " 100
Mrs. F. W. CHRISTMAN, New York, N. Y., " 100
A. WERNER, " " " " 100
W. E. BOORAK, " " " " 100
J. LIENAU, " " " " 100
H. G. WHITE, Buffalo, " " " 100
J. P. DIMMOCK, New York, " " " Two 200
B. W. FISHER, " " " " Ten 1,000
JOE. T. WHITE, " " " " Five 500
L. T. IVER, Detroit, Mich., Two 200
B. W. MEDDAUGH, Detroit, Mich., Five 500
BOW. M. DAVIS, Philadelphia, Pa., One 100
Mrs. LUCRETIA MOTT, " " " " 100
WENNER BOECKLER, Burlington, Iowa, " 100
D. G. CHITTENDEN, Milwaukee, Wis., One 100
Mrs. FRED. SIMS, Keokuk, Iowa, " 100
E. B. WOLCOTT, Milwaukee, Wis., " 100
G. D. KESINGER, " " " " 100
THOS. BOOVER, " " " " 100
Mrs. MARY C. DAVIS, " " " " Two 200
ERNEST PRUISING, Chicago, Ill., Five 500
S. H. PEARSON, Boston, Mass., One 100
J. L. TAYLOR, Cincinnati, Ohio, Two 200
H. L. HALL, Chicago, Ill., One 100
A. RYMAN, Wheeling, Va., One 100
VALENTINE LUDWIG, Alleghany City, Pa., " 100
Mrs. NANCY GERSHART, " " " " 100
CHAS. CHUBBULL, Cincinnati, Ohio, " 100
D. J. DAVISON, Detroit, Mich., " 100
JOHN HARPER, Battle Creek, " " " 100
C. M. STILES, " " " " 100
E. U. STILES, " " " " 100
WM. NEWMAN, " " " " 100
W. P. WILSON, " " " " 100
CHAS. GHAETER, Vincennes, Ind., " 100
GUST. ZECHKE, Indianapolis, " " " 100
W. H. OYINGTON, Chicago, Ill., Ten 1,000
O. A. NICHOLSON, Alleghany City, Pa., One 100
G. M. DAUSMAN, Evansville, Ind., " 100
C. S. BUNT, Danville, Ill., " 100
JOHN H. LULL, Dubuque, Iowa, " 100
S. S. WEMUTT, " " " " 100
D. B. HENDERSON, " " " " 100
HENRY A. DRAV, " " " " Two 200
CHAS. M. WETTERBER, " " " " One 100
Mrs. M. N. ADAMS, Dubuque, Iowa, " 100
Mrs. MARY WESTFAL, " " " " 100
C. R. WOODWARD, Cairo, Ill., " 100
M. S. BRIGHAM, " " " " 100
CHAS. A. BOOPFIELD, " " " " 100
JOSEPH SINGER, Chicago, " " " 100
W. B. BILLINGS, " " " " Five 500

CHAS. A. GURLEY, Pulaski, N. Y., Two 200
M. E. LEBLE, De roit, Mich., One 100
E. P. TAYLOR, " " " " 100
FREDERICK STRAUB, " " " " 100
GEORGE JEROME, " " " " 100
WM. WILEY, " " " " 100
GEO. N. FLETCHER, " " " " 100
J. E. HITCHCOCK, Oberlin, Ohio, " 100
ROBERT MOORE, Cleveland, Ohio, " 100
Mrs A. HALL, Northampton, Mass., " 100
J. S. HILL, Murrell, Kansas, " 100
P. V. WINE, St. Joseph, Mo., " 100
C. MURAT MASTERSON, " " " " 100
W. N. CLARK, Cleveland, Ohio, " 100
HENRY APTHORP, Ashabula, " " " " 200
W. P. EWING, " " " " Five 500
H. E. PARSONS, " " " " Ten 1,000
S. C. GALE, Minneapolis, Minn., One 100
Mrs. MARY PRAGHT, Cincinnati, Ohio, " 100
WM. BISMARCK PRAGHT, " " " " 100
JOHN J. STEVENS, O-wego, N. Y., " 100
C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, Mo., " 100
J. HENRY CLARK, " " " " 100
E. B. WALDO, " " " " 100
G. N. STEARNS, " " " " 100
JOHN M. RICE, " " " " 100
MARSHALL PHOS., Minneapolis, Minn., " 100
S. LYDARD, Long Lake, " " " " Two 200
J. G. RICHARDSON, Lake City, " " " " One 100
DR. D. K. HOUTKILL, " " " " 100
E. E. GRANT, Minneapolis, Minn., " 100
Mrs. E. CHERRY, Portage City, Wis., " 100
WM. H. ELLIOTT, Burlington, Iowa, " 100
LYMAN T. O'BORN, Auburn, N. Y., " 100
P. C. TURNER, Albany, " " " " 100
M. SCHLESINGER, " " " " 100
JOSEPH KNIGHT, Troy, " " " " 100
L. S. BRYANT, Dayton, Ohio, " " " " 100

$77,100

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION:
CONDITIONAL STOCK LIST.

We, the undersigned, subscribers to the capital stock of the Index Association, agree to double our previous subscriptions to said stock on the same terms as before, taking respectively the additional number of shares set opposite to our names in the list below:
PROVIDED, That the full sum of One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000) shall have been subscribed in good faith by the twenty-sixth day of October, 1872—that is, within one year from the date when THE INDEX passed into the hands of the Index Association.

ALEX. COCHRAN, Franklin, Pa., Five Shares, $500
CHAS. A. GURLEY, Pulaski, N. Y., Two " 200
MAX PRAGHT, Cincinnati, Ohio, " " 200
	$900

The Index.

SEPTEMBER 7, 1872.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.
N. B.—All letters, business or otherwise, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio."

F. M. A. REPORT.

The pamphlet Report of the Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association for the present year is now ready for distribution.

It contains the report of the Executive Committee; Essays, by John W. Chadwick on "Liberty and the Church in America," by Chas. D. B. Mills on the question—"Does Religion represent a Permanent Sentiment of the Human Mind or is it a Perishable Superstition?" and by O. B. Frothingham on "The Religion of Humanity;" and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucretia Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Seaver, Alexander Loos, and others.

Price of the Pamphlet Thirty-five cents. For this sum it will be sent by mail, post-paid, on addressing the undersigned at New Bedford, Mass.

Members of the Association who have paid the annual fee, and those who will now make themselves members by the payment of One Dollar, will receive the Report without additional cost.

WM. J. POTTER,

Secretary.

"If I could be granted the absolute control of one hundred Anglo-Saxon children during the period between the age of four and eighteen, I would guarantee that, at the age of thirty, seventy-five of them would be frog-worshippers, and fifty of these would persecute any one who did not share their religious convictions. I say Anglo-Saxon children; in the matter of persecution, I would promise to do still better with children of the Latin race." So says Mr. David E. Cronin. A little exaggeration, doubtless; but the power of education is forcibly, if whimsically, illustrated. In view of the above frightful results of Mr. Cronin's educational prowess, however, we deprecate his nomination for the office of School Superintendent.

IS PROTESTANTISM CHRISTIAN?

A fortnight ago Mr. Potter had a very carefully written paper on the recent refusal of the Trustees of the Williams Fund, in Harvard Divinity Schools, to make the customary appropriation to a student who could not, at least unqualifiedly, profess himself a "Christian." By the terms of the bequest, every beneficiary of this fund must be a "Protestant," but was otherwise exempted from all tests of belief. The refusal of the Trustees appears to have been based on a rule they have adopted to grant appropriations only to those who declare their intention of becoming "Christian ministers." But this rule is regarded as contradicting the letter and spirit of Mr. Williams' will, which exacts only that the beneficiary shall be a "Protestant." Mr. Potter closes his paper, which could not have been written with a more evident purpose to be scrupulously just, with these words:—"Unless the Trustees can give better reasons for their action than have yet been shown, there are very many persons who cannot help believing that they are faithless to their trust."

Now we venture to add some remarks of our own on this subject, partly because we think that the action of the Trustees admits of a pretty forcible defence on their own ground, and partly because we wish to say something about Protestantism in general. Of course we should be extremely glad to see the appropriations from the Williams Fund made absolutely without reference to belief or creed, provided such had been the intention of the donor; and we should be peculiarly glad to see such relief extended to the young man whose excellent letter was recently printed. But the proper management of a testamentary trust-fund is not a matter of feeling at all; it is a matter of integrity, of fidelity to conditions which have become fixed and unalterable. This is admitted, and the only point properly under consideration is whether the Trustees, in making appropriations to "Christians" alone, have violated either the letter or spirit of the clause which confines the appropriations to "Protestants." Although we of course do not sympathize at all with the restriction imposed upon the Trustees, we nevertheless cannot but think that the courts would sustain them in interpreting the word "Protestant" as necessarily implying the word "Christian;" nor should we be able to regard this decision as otherwise than intrinsically just. There can be little doubt that the Trustees would defend themselves at law by urging this interpretation of the word "Protestant" as alike fair to the letter and the spirit of Mr. Williams' will. And there is as little doubt in our own mind that the cool and unbiased judgment of a competent tribunal would decide the point in their favor.

At the time when Mr. Williams founded this charity, the issue was between Trinitarian Christianity and Unitarian Christianity, both being recognized forms of Protestantism. The Unitarians all strongly defended their right to the Christian name against the Orthodox party, who denied it to them; and this they do at the present day, having almost succeeded in extorting from their opponents a general confession of their right to this name. It was not then suspected that any student who wished to become a minister of religion should ever scruple to declare himself a Christian; that issue was not then made. What Mr. Williams might do to-day, were he alive, is not discoverable; what he would have done at that time, is the real point to be settled; and that he would have declared it his purpose to help indigent students fit themselves for the Protestant Christian ministry, if the question had then been put to him, seems to us certain beyond all reasonable doubt. If he had meant to concede to his beneficiaries an absolute liberty of opinion, he would not have required them to be Protestants; the very fact of this restriction shows that he by no means designed to give his money indiscriminately to all students of good moral character; and that the spirit as well as the letter of his will justifies the action of the Trustees in establishing their present rule, we must in candor admit.

Is there really any ground of complaint that one who has ceased to be able to declare himself a Christian should be debarred from some of the privileges of a Christian institution like the Divinity School of Harvard College? We think not. Whoever has taken that position should nerve himself to make the inevitable sacrifices; and this is one of them. The price of freedom must be paid; and this is part of it. Much as we wish to see our universities broad enough to ignore all distinctions of belief in the bestowal of their privileges, we think it a better plan to seek the establishment of new and more liberal charities, than to incur even the suspicion of wresting old charities from the purposes for which they were originally founded. Even with our own decided convictions respecting Christianity, we do not see how we could do otherwise, were we a Trustee of the Williams Fund, than to approve the present rule in the distribution of its revenue. That is, so far as the Trustees are concerned, we think they have faithfully and conscientiously carried out the actual intent of the founder of the charity. This intent was not wholly liberal, according to the modern idea of liberality; and we should certainly decline to act as one of the Trustees in the highly improbable event of our election to that office. But we think it due to the present Trustees to express our own view of their action, as a contribution towards a fair verdict from the public.

In the last analysis, this whole question turns on the real meaning of the word "Protestant." Does it connote "Christian?" Is it to be taken for granted, in the commonest sense of the word, which is evidently the sense of it in Mr. Williams' will, that every "Protestant" is a "Protestant Christian?"

Now there are two common senses of this word, usually distinguished by the initial letter. A "protestant" is simply one who protests, no matter against what; a "Protestant" is one who protests against the authority of the Roman Catholic Church. Worcester in his great quarto dictionary thus defines the word, as used in the latter sense:—"Originally, one of the reformers of North Germany, adherents to Luther, who, in the year 1529, protested against the decree of the Imperial Diet held at Spire. The name is now given to a member of any one of the various denominations of Christians which have sprung from the adoption of the principles of the Reformation." Can there be much doubt that it was in this latter sense that Mr. Williams employed the word in his will? If not, then the Trustees of the Williams Fund are in honor and in law obliged, whatever may be their convictions, to make appropriations to those students only who are members of the "various denominations of Christians." In the article to which we have referred, Mr. Potter says nothing of this interpretation of the word "Protestant" in the original terms of the Williams bequest, and undoubtedly it failed to occur to him as a probable defence of the Trustees against his criticisms. In fact, his own use of the word in his closing paragraph shows this to have been the case:—"He [Mr. Williams] was evidently a staunch believer in Protestantism; and were he alive, we believe he would say unhesitatingly to his Trustees—'Give especially to the writer of the Protestant declaration above cited.'" It seems more probable, however, that the word was used by Mr. Williams in the narrow and technical sense given by the dictionary, than that it was used in the broad and generous sense which Mr. Potter is instinctively inclined to assign to it. The hard and ugly fact sometimes clashes disappointingly with our nobler sentiments; but when, as in this case, it obviates the necessity of passing a severe personal judgment, we feel quite sure that our friend will be glad that we have ventured to call attention to it.

To every lover of a liberty of thought that is without limit, Christianity in all its forms, Greek, Catholic, or Protestant, turns to ashes in his mouth, like the fabled apples of Sodom. It is wise to look this fact steadily in the face. It is an ungracious task to be constantly obtruding it on eyes that take more delight in ideal views. How much pleasanter it would be if Christianity would but melt insensibly away, without forcing an issue with civilization at every step! Alas, that cannot be. The film that now covers myriads of eyes, and blinds them to the hardness of outline that is inseparable from Christianity, will by and by fall off; and then it will be plain that the only pathway of civilization lies over the ruins of the ancient edifice. The lesser apparent rigidity of Protestantism is but the ragged edges of the crumbling walls; no perfect freedom is possible, until mankind shall have levelled the useless pile, macadamized their road with it, and emerged upon the broad, beautiful plains of the Future beyond.

SUBSTANCE AND SHADOW.

It is a first principle in physics that shadow follows and clings to substance, and the rule holds good, of course, in things metaphysical. But it does not always seem to. The shadow appears to lie on one side of the wall, while the real object is on the other. An announcement in a daily paper reported recently the sudden death of a lady whose name (Mrs. Mary Van Rensselaer) is on the list of the subscribers to THE INDEX stock, and in an obituary notice the same paper spoke of her as a member of Calvary Church in New York, intimating at the same time that her funeral services would be in accordance with Episcopal rites. All of which was doubtless true, but it gave so mistaken an idea of the spiritual region in which the good lady lived, and of the fold within which she died, that a reflection of some significance sprang up at once on reading it. It was my happy fortune to know her well. She was of old and aristocratic parentage, wealthy, cultivated and distinguished. By marriage she was associated with one of the great Dutch families whose names are associated with the earliest history and with the subsequent opulence, dignity, and social elegance of New York. She had travelled much, and resided long in Europe, living in familiar relations with people of rank and high intelligence. She had lived in the great world, not of fashion merely, but of beauty, accomplishment and mind. She was a live reader, a ready listener, a fluent talker, an active recipient of bright thoughts, an independent thinker on all subjects that came before her, warm-hearted, eager, benevolent, thoroughly kind and human, thoroughly gentle and generous.

She was born into the Episcopal church; all people of fashion, wealth, and social position, were, are to a degree still, in fact, though to a diminished and steadily diminishing degree. Her connection with the church was made even closer by marriage. Her husband's people were church people from the very nature of things, were unable to comprehend how first-class people could be anything else. Their church and their circle went together; their church was their selectest circle; all the elect families, all the holders of reserved seats were there, and while her husband lived, her visible presence was there also; her shadow lay there, but her spiritual substance was elsewhere.

Long before her husband died, this fine intelligence had surveyed other fields and taken up its abode in a new house. She was a steadfast and by no means silent disbeliever in the popular mythology. The doubters laid their books on her table and she diligently read them. The radical publications of the old countries furnished her mind with congenial materials. She soon became acquainted with the Radical, and made others acquainted with it too. Wherever she might be, copies were sent to her which she loved to distribute, as seeds of new thought. She was a heretic and a promoter of heresy. THE INDEX found in her a hearty friend. She admired its spirit, was interested in its views, increased its circulation. Had her wealth remained to her, she would have given it, and other good things, a strong support. But it did not. Pecuniary misfortunes restricted her ability to befriending her new faiths, but, by driving her back on them for moral sustenance, deepened her interest in them. On her husband's decease, which occurred something more than a year ago, she made more open personal demonstration of her faith by joining the only society in New York that was organized by it. Her attachment to it was sincere, her attendance at its meetings was constant. She came to its social gatherings; she was one of the pastor's private class, and as responsive as any to the latest conclusions of historical and scientific criticism. In all humanities she was heartily concerned, her natural sweetness of temper preparing her for the earnest suggestions of a genuine religion of humanity.

The noble, gracious woman dies, and the Episcopal church claims her as its own. It had a right to do so on its principle that once hers is always hers, that nominally hers is hers sincerely. She had never formally withdrawn from her old association. Perhaps her catholicity made it seem unimportant to do so; perhaps her catholicity prevented her doing so; perhaps she forgot it, did not think of it, or thought of it as too slight a matter to act on; perhaps the old church had become so unreal to her that nothing substantial remained to retire from. It no more occurred to her to sign off from it than it occurs to the well-grown youth to take formal leave of his childish garments. However it may have been, she did not withdraw, and so Calvary Church retains her name on its register, and, with the fashionable world, has the credit of her membership.

So it is all the time. The new faith has few nominal adherents. They who profess it, profess it cordially; the name of belonging to it is nothing—something less than nothing, indeed. The old faith has an increasing list of nominal adherents. Its cordial professors are falling off. The name of belonging to it is something still; the virtue of belonging to it is passing away. My friend's example is one of very many. The registers of all the churches, not Episcopal only, but Congregational, contain the worthy names of men and women who are dead to their beliefs and communions, whose lives are working to undermine their foundations. Could the new faith have their names along with their influence, it would become distinguished as well as strong. For the present it is best as it is, for distinction is dangerous; a fine name may injure more than a fine influence will help. Poverty, obscurity, and neglect are the nurses of pure religion. Give us the hearts, and the old church may have the titles. Give us such characters as our dear friend brought, and the registers of Calvary may keep her initials. We are better without the prestige which is their glory.

O. B. F.

WHAT RADICALS NEED.

One of our contemporaries, whose criticisms of radicalism are generally offered in the spirit of candor, kindness, and sympathy, said in its issue of a few weeks ago along with many commendatory remarks, that the great want of radicals is a "true apprehension of the value and working of institutions."

We believe the criticism is just. We are not too individualistic, but we are too little social and co-operative. We fight like bush-whackers, each one on his own hook, and thus lose the human sympathy and encouragement which comes from elbow touch and united tread. There is a social and gregarious instinct in most men which must be gratified. The solitaires, the men like the one Emerson speaks of who constantly "suffered at being seen where he was, and consoled himself with the delicious thought of the inconceivable number of places where he was not," are exceptions. Most of us feel the need of the voice and hand of sympathy. We can stand alone, but we want some other company and conversation than self and soliloquy. We need not lose our personality and independence if we sit down with one another. We may strengthen the bond of sympathy without converting it into a yoke. There is no imperative necessity that we have a stomach in common, like polyps, because our mouths are in the same room. We can sympathize, organize, co-operate, and institute, without surrendering a jot or tittle of our personal liberty, which we prize so much and guard so jealously. Because old organizations have often been prisons where reason was cramped and tyrannized over, it does not necessarily follow that all organization is evil. Denomination and despotism are not synonymous terms. "Because the shoe pinches, we do not throw all shoes to the dogs and go barefoot. If the old institutions were bad, we must build better, but we must build. Organizations we must have or die. Man is a creature of organization. He lives in and by institutions."

Political ideas are embodied in parties. No doubt there is corruption in all parties, but, corruption or no corruption, we must have parties. They are a necessity, and, since they are a necessity, we are bound to recognize them and act through them. We cannot ignore them. Call politics an evil if you will; if so, it is a necessary evil in the present stage of our civilization, and will and must exist until the time when each man becomes a "law to himself" and needs not to make laws for others. We think it is every man's duty to take sides in political contests if he can, and throw the weight of his influence into one of the party scales. This makes him a party man, but not necessarily a blind and bigoted partisan. Of course, in all organized work there are peculiar temptations and dangers. In political parties the danger is that men will love party more than country, and, losing the end in the means, come to identify the welfare of their country with the interests of their party, and say like Gen. Cochrane that "if the Devil himself were the party candidate, he would vote for him." There is this danger, that in loyalty to party men will be traitors to their country. But the risk we must run, meanwhile teaching men to esteem character above candidates, and prize principles more than parties.

If political ideas must be embodied in parties to make them practical, so none the less must religious ideas be embodied in associations in order to become conspicuous and exert a general influence upon the world at large. If you want my political vote, you must adopt and publish your platform and bring out your candidate; and if you expect my active sympathy and co-operation in religious movements, you must proclaim your principles,—not what I must believe, but what you do believe,—and invite me to join you and organize a society, and build a hall or church and establish yourself as an institution. There is of course danger in religious as well as in political organization. The danger is that the majority will impose upon the minority a creed obnoxious to them,—that the strong in numbers will tyrannize over the weak. The Unitarian Association foresaw this danger and tried to avert it, but failed. They struck the rock and the denomination split. The Free Religious Association anticipated the same result in time to avoid it. They have now made their platform of fellowship so broad that Christian, Theist and Atheist can stand on it, with plenty of elbow-room. Nothing short of this broad human fellowship will satisfy them. You need not declare yourself a "follower of Christ" or of Moses, Mahomet or Buddha, or any other man, to join their ranks. Whoever is in earnest to know the truth and to do the right, is welcome.

But another danger which religious organizations have to meet is that, like political organizations, when once established, they are apt to resort to fraud and deception to gain strength and cover up weaknesses. The chief "scandal" of the Methodist Book Concern was not that some officer misappropriated denominational funds, but that so many of the Methodist clergy, in order to save the reputation of their denomination, were willing to convict and condemn the honest and heroic Dr. Lanahan for ferreting out the dishonesty, and to deceive the public by concealing and denying the frauds he had brought to light. As the Nation says:—"It is impossible for anybody who has followed the history of the affair from the beginning to resist the conclusion that the ideal church of most of those who have taken part in these proceedings is not a church of unquestioned purity, but a church in which there is no dissension, and that they would rather bear with thefts, frauds, false entries, and erasures in the Book Concern than with the violence and uproar attendant on bringing them to light." If the "ideal church" of the radicals is to be modeled after this one, we could ask that it might never be built. Far better have no institution than one that rests on concealment and deception.

But we believe there can be radical organizations that rest on honesty as well as reason. These evils spoken of are only accidental, not necessary. There are liberals everywhere, but the trouble is they do not organize and build institutions. They stand aloof and alone, and pipe to the hills and woods their solos about "truth, truth," and nothing but echoes come of it. Most men tire of our eternal solo. We long for an occasional quartette and chorus, and are apt to run off to churches, even to churches whose creeds we detest, in order to meet and sing with others. We will shut our eyes to the ugly sentiment of the hymns, in order to open our ears and enjoy the sentiment of the song. We will endure all kinds of mushy sentiment, platitudes, and nonsense from the preacher in order to see and sing with the people. Thousands of young persons, and some not so young, go to evangelical churches because there are no liberal churches accessible. Thousands of men, radical in thought and liberal in spirit, lend their presence and donate their money and their influence to the support of doctrines which they believe are false and harmful. Is this right? Let liberal people throughout the country organize and furnish a place for the young and old to go and hear the gospel they believe, and, depend upon it, preachers, teachers, and lecturers will be found to supply the demand.

W. H. S.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

I write to-day from Ashfield, Massachusetts, as just a year ago to-day wanting one week. Everything here and hereabouts seems unchanged excepting that the hills, fields and forests are greener than then, and, so far, more beautiful, always excepting the tobacco patches and plantations, which to me are more and more a blotch and plague-spot and deformity, the more there are of them and the greater their growth. But I bore my testimony against them and the whole tobacco business in your pages, last year.

I suppose you, and everybody, and everything else, will have to bend a little before the political tornado which must rage and rule till November. I am glad, however, to think, indeed to know, that none are less shaken by it, so far, than are your associates and co-workers in the cause of liberal ideas in religion. Wendell Phillips used to say, and I had good reason to believe, that the true and thoroughly read abolitionists were the best educated people in the community, on all the more common and general practical questions pertaining to politics, religion and almost everything else. They certainly read and heard the best and most important things.

It is just so with readers of your paper and the supporters of liberal religious principles and freedom of discussion in every direction. They are not the birds to be caught by anybody's chaff, political or religious.

There was a talk the other day about a comet or some other atmospheric battering-ram which was believed to have designs on this rather rickety planet of ours. Astronomers and other observers away in Europe fancied they felt the approach. But perhaps it was only some stray gusts from our approaching presidential election, which, according to much of our "stump oratory," on both sides, is to be of such moment as to shake not only earth but also heaven. You, Mr. Editor, intimated in last week's INDEX that you should probably vote for Grant, but "without enthusiasm." Just so will many of your readers, and so others for Greeley; but all, so far as I have seen, "without enthusiasm"—every one.

But your readers and patrons are not without enthusiasm in their grander enterprise of diffusing light, knowledge, truth, and the love of justice and right among the people, on whatever subjects affect the general welfare. And my meetings yesterday here in Ashfield showed that the interest of our friends in the good cause is unabated.

P. P.

The Massachusetts Republican Convention, held at Worcester, August 28, adopted the following among its resolutions as a part of the State party platform:—

"Resolved, That we heartily approve of the recognition of the rights of woman contained in the fourteenth clause of the national Republican platform; that the Republican party of Massachusetts, as the representative of liberty and progress, is in favor of extending the suffrage on equal terms to all American citizens, irrespective of sex, and will hail the day when the educated intellect and enlightened conscience of woman finds direct expression at the ballot-box."

This declaration is the frankest yet made in behalf of the equal political rights of woman by any important political body, and should be regarded as a great onward step towards the victory of impartial justice. The great majority of women in this country would doubtless vote conservatively; but whatever the results of their political action, their right to act politically cannot be denied without oppression, and we record the above resolution with entire approval.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

SCRIPTURE OLD AND NEW.

BY REV. E. C. TOWNE.

IN THE INDEX of August 10th, Mr. Conway mentions the fact that the custom of his pulpit is to have a meditation in place of a prayer. This is, he says, "a religious utterance, which for some years has been substituted for the 'prayer,' which is no longer known" in his service. He then gives a striking example of a meditation, consisting of sentences all intended to enforce the idea that—"The way to God is through the heart of man."

It is very easy to see that Mr. Conway's meditation in no way takes the place of a prayer, but is rather a scripture, an original utterance of some inspiration of truth. Whether prayer should be thus set wholly aside cannot be a closed question with the success of any such meditation. There is no more thorough radical anywhere than Samuel Johnson; and of him one of his oldest and wisest friends once said that his prayers are the perfection of pulpit utterance. We doubt whether anybody not strongly prejudiced would wish to have Mr. Johnson omit the prayer from his service. The truth seems to be that radical ideas do not exclude that form of religious utterance, but only change its tone and method. If we simply express our feelings to the Divine Mind, and do not try to use them for persuasion or compulsion, we do not go beyond the proper attitude of man before God. Neither the absence of feelings, nor their silence, is required of us. And chiefly or wholly our feelings may take the tone of offering rather than of asking, and so strictly avoid the slightest appearance of impropriety. And to me it seems very desirable not to lose this form of religious utterance. Let there be perfect freedom about it, to have it or not to have it, as the spirit or occasion may suggest. But do not make a point of getting rid of it.

The meditation is a good thing. The true minister will prove his calling by real inspiration, and the attempt ought to be made to produce utterances of evident inspiration, passages of real scripture, in connection with reading of old scripture selected from various sources, or to take the place, at times, of old scripture. In such utterances the mind will keep to simple and evident truths, bringing them out clearly and strongly, with depth of religious feeling and force of expression. There is a sort of biblical style to be used in such utterances, just as poetry has its own style; and certain necessary limits are to be kept. But there is no reason why psalm, proverb, chronicle, prophecy, parable should not drop fresh from living lips, as well as be forever read out of the record of ancient inspiration.

What the matter and style of such utterances should be ought to be very carefully considered, since no commonplace speech can be made to have the force of a scripture, and great pains should be taken not to use for scripture anything which fails of this force. Perhaps the greatest task now open to religious minds is to take up the writing of genuine new bible sentences, which can be read with the effect of clear, pure scripture. It is not enough to light upon good thoughts; the ordinary gatherers of these make a great mistake in thinking that a mere good thought can be put to a biblical use. For such a use a thought should have a peculiar simplicity, clearness, and directness, so as to easily touch the feelings, as well as interest the understanding. The highest gifts of imagination and discipline of taste will hardly suffice for writing genuine new bible, but undoubtedly it can and will be done. Any minister may experiment by writing out his scripture lessons, either from the common bible, or from other old bible, or from his own mind. Probably the best rule would be to take some texts of common bible, and some with these of other bible gathered almost anywhere, and in addition to work in some original texts, making the whole as elevated and impressive as possible.

The old must take a prominent place, for the sake of the power of association, and the new must catch the method and tone of the old, in order not to seem raw and impertinent.

One of the things which need to be done is to make a compend of the pure parts of our common bible, and another of pure texts from other old bibles of other religions, and still another of pure texts out of modern writings. To do this satisfactorily will demand the finest knowledge, the purest insight, the happiest judgment, and great learning. Perhaps many attempts will be made before success will be achieved. The greatest difficulty is to reject enough, there is so little genuine bible anywhere. A small volume would contain all that the race has yet produced. A good practical method might be to gather the texts of single works, as they come in each work, into provisional chapters in a publication like THE INDEX, and, after getting out a quantity thus of unarranged texts, arrange them from the printed slips into suitable chapters, according to topics. If this is attempted, it should be under competent editorship, and with the concurrent aid of many scholars and thinkers interested in the work.

[Nothing could more please us than to be enabled to do what Mr. Towne so well points out, and what we have long desired to do. But to enlist the co-operation of the best scholars in this noble work would require far more money than is likely to be at our disposal. If our numerous wealthy subscribers only realized what could be done with money in this cause, they would pour it out like water.—ED.]

POSITIVISM AND FREE RELIGION.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—“O. B. F.” in your issue of August 10th, says:—“Few people understand what Positivism precisely is; fewer yet understand, or pretend to understand, or find it possible even with considerable honest pains-taking to understand, what the ‘Religion of Humanity’ as grounded on Positivism is or implies.”

I regret, as a “complete” Positivist, to have to complain that the writer himself strangely misconceives our position on nearly all important points. I am the more astounded at this, as “O. B. F.” has stated our view of Immortality in terms which any one of us would have been glad to have used had we his command of precise and forcible language.

We heartily sympathize with “O. B. F.” in his desire to difference the Free Religious movement from that in which we Positivists are engaged; and we shall be glad to co-operate with him in disabusing the public of the impression that the two schools of thought are substantially the same. The one, as “O. B. F.” well remarks, is the legitimate offspring of the Transcendental school of New England, while the other, as we claim, is the purest result of the modern scientific movement, in its application to all the higher problems of human life. The former issues, as we think, in negations; its students are mainly intent upon finding out what not to believe, while Positivism is affirmative. It has a polity, a solution of all the ills of life, of the vexed questions of the day; a solution not absolute but relative, not invariable but adapted to each emergency. Free Religion is doing good destructive work in getting rid of the rubbish of Orthodoxy, but it has no polity, scarcely an opinion upon all the vital issues which affect men's daily lives. Positivists, the world over, stand by the laboring class and make its cause theirs; but “O. B. F.” on the eight-hour question at least, is on the side of the employer.

Now for a few corrections of some of “O. B. F.’s” specific statements.

1. It is not true that Positivists are at “deadly war” with the evolutionists, for the very good reason that Auguste Comte discovered all that was valuable in that theory, and applied it fully and luminously to human history. Indeed his famous “Law of the Three States” is the highest, best, and most fruitful generalization of that doctrine. It is quite true that this theory of evolution in its entirety has been most distinctly formulated by Herbert Spencer, while its best known and most popular application is that of Darwin. I speak for all American Positivists when I say that we accept, unreservedly, all of Spencer's and Darwin's conclusions on this point, subject, of course, to such corrections as the progress of science may make in the views put forth by these eminent philosophers.

“O. B. F.’s” misconception on this point may have been because of the question raised by Comte as to the utility of the speculations current in his day respecting the origin of the universe and of life. He took the ground that, in a world full of sin and misery, it is a waste of time and cerebral force to keep on discussing questions which only indirectly affect mankind. He wished, mistakenly perhaps, that the whole philosophic and scientific world would apply itself to the discovery and application of those sociological laws upon which the immediate interests of humanity most depend.

2. Nor is it true that Positivists reject psychology, as that term is now understood. In Comte's day this word designated the school of Cousin and Royer-Collard—in other words, the French transcendentalists or intuitionists, who projected a science of mind out of their own inner consciousness, uncorrected by objective facts. But he himself was a psychologist, in the sense that Mill, Bain, and Spencer are psychologists—in studying the phenomena of mind in subordination to biology and physiology.

3. “O. B. F.” is sadly in error in supposing that Positivists have any special dogma, scheme, programme, or panacea to cure all the ills of life. Our whole doctrine is relative, not absolute. We have no faith in machinery of political action to effect the re-organization of society. The change for the better must come, if it comes at all, from a higher morality than any which has yet obtained universal acceptance.

4. “O. B. F.” is also mistaken in supposing that American Positivists reject the distinctive ceremonial of the Religion of Humanity, as laid down by the master. The establishment of a church such as Comte sketched is not yet possible; and when it comes, it may have a different symbolism from that he tentatively proposed. Positivists, both here and in Europe, regard all his recommendations as provisional, so far as they relate to ceremonies, rituals, etc. Our religion and the symbolism which will accompany it must be a growth; it can never be an arbitrary creation.

With regard to that crust we partook of at the anniversary of Comte's birth-day, last January, permit me to explain that the observance was not to comply with any of the provisional recommendations of the master. We did it to commemorate a daily practice of Comte during the last part of his life. It was his wont to eat a crust of dry bread only, at one of his daily meals, to remind him of the misery of millions of human beings on the globe who have not even that wherewithal to allay the pangs of hunger.

In conclusion, permit me to add that Positivism begins where Free Religion leaves off. Your work is destructive, ours constructive. You are getting rid of the old order, we are laying the foundations of the new. You are laborers blasting away the rocks; we architects planning the structure of the new temple of humanity. We Positivists are actively at work trying to solve all the problems relating to man's life upon this planet—problems the very existence of which is unknown to the Free Religionists, if we are to judge of them by their printed literature.

NEW YORK, Aug. 14, 1872. C. G. DAVID.

[We presume that Mr. Frothingham will not object to the publication of the above “correction,” though it makes more errors than it corrects; especially as the overwhelming air of superiority assumed makes it too amusing to be offensive.

In our last two lectures in the Horticultural Hall course in Boston, we have sought to point out two very distinct tendencies in the Free Religious movement, the “scientific” and the “intuitionist.” The latter is, as Mr. Frothingham justly observes, the product of New England transcendentalism; but the former has little or nothing to do with it, and it is with the former that we chiefly sympathize. This scientific school of free religious thinkers accepts science as the last appeal in all problems of thought; but it does not, like the petty clique of which Mr. David is a representative, and of which his “Positivist Primer” is an excellent exposition, assume to be itself the head, tail and body of science. On the contrary it holds that all scientific men are merely “laborers,” and that any man or body of men that cherishes the conceit of being the “architect,” is simply the fly perched on the rim of the wheel that fancied it made the coach go. Mr. David sadly needs tuition in the modesty of science, and he is little likely to get it by indulging such inflated notions as are expressed above. There is no sect in the world more sectarian—more narrow, exclusive, and aristocratic in spirit, and more absolutely out of harmony with all modern or American ideas—than the handful of people who are trying to build up an ecclesiasticism on the foundation of science. The readers of THE INDEX have lately had the opportunity of knowing what we think of “Positivism” in its larger aspect; but it may be well to say here that we had no reference whatever to this little retrogressive ecclesiastical crusade against the freedom and equality of man, which would be dangerous were it not preposterous. The peril is infinitesimal from such a quarter. No ecclesiasticism is possible on a scientific basis. One might as well hope to build a new St. Peter's three leagues from shore. The only ecclesiasticism possible is that of dogma, and this is found in Rome. That any set of men claiming to have the least possible tincture of the scientific spirit should infatuate themselves with this vagary of a Church of Science, is one of the most curious anomalies of the age. The historian will record it with a smile.—ED.]

THE SPIRIT OF THE NEW REFORM.

DAVENPORT, IOWA, Aug. 18, 1872.

FRIEND ABBOT:—

I hereby authorize you to add my name to the list of “Conditional Stock Subscriptions” for two additional shares, making in all three shares.

Also insert in the list of unconditional subscriptions the name of my wife, Mrs. Mary Pracht, and son, Wm. Bismarck Pracht, for one share each.

I may add that I do this without the knowledge or consent of my son, who is less than two years of age; but I hope the time will come when he can say—“I am thankful that I have been spared the pangs of the ‘new birth’ from the dark womb of Orthodoxy into the world of Liberty and Light.”

I sincerely hope that our friends at large will push this matter of stock subscription to an early conclusion. THE INDEX deserves all that our kind and liberal friends can possibly do for it and the cause which it represents. For my part, I am willing to double my subscription again, if necessary and possible, to make it the success it must and will be.

Will you permit me, through your columns, to kindly thank the many friends whom I meet in my travels almost daily? They have done very much to make my stay among them pleasant, and have often, at a loss of time and much trouble to themselves, personally introduced me to the friends of Liberalism, in their respective localities, as the long lists of subscribers obtained through their help will abundantly testify.

Looking at our work from my point of view, I am greatly encouraged; and I can assure our friends at large that THE INDEX is destined to exert an influence for good that is second to none. The time is near at hand when our subscription list will rank with that of any publication on this continent.

You may think that I am too sanguine; but my daily intercourse with all classes of people, inhabiting a vast area of territory, has demonstrated to me that there is a thick substratum of liberalism under the matted sod of Orthodoxy, which needs but the “subsoil plough” of THE INDEX, and the bright rays of Free Religion, to become fruitful of new life. The weeds will soon be turned under.

The only complaint I hear about THE INDEX is that there is not enough of it.

Truly your friend,

MAX PRACHT.

FISH-HOOK CHRISTIANITY.

[By Rev. T. DeWitt Talmadge, in the New York Advocate.]

These words are appropriate to those who are engaged in Christian work. The Church of God has been fishing along the shore. We set our net in a good, calm place, and in sight of a fine chapel, and we go down every Sunday to see if the fish have been wise enough to come into our net. We might learn something from that boy with his hook and line. He throws his line from a bridge: no fish. He sits down on a log: no fish. He stands in the sunlight and casts the line; but no fish. He goes up by the mill-dam, and stands behind the bank, where the fish cannot see him, and he has hardly dropped the hook before the cork goes under. The fish come to him as fast as he can throw them ashore. In other words, in our Christian work, why do we not go where the fish are? It is not so easy to catch souls in church, for they know we are trying to take them. If you can throw your line out into the world where they are not expecting you, they will be captured. Is it fair to take men by such stratagems? Yes. I would like to cheat five thousand souls into the kingdom. Our Tabernacle Free College, within one year, will be doing the work of many churches. The students set their net last night on the back streets, and will set it every night this week in destitute places; and soon we shall have a hundred lay preachers, proclaiming the Gospel day by day and week by week, and three or four hundred Christians prepared for other styles of Christian work. If a man does not appreciate that work, he is stupid beyond all arousal. The whole policy of the Church of God is to be changed. Instead of chiefly looking after the few who have become Christians, our chief efforts will be for those outside.

Minnie, a three-year-old girl, got tired of “Now I lay me,” and told her mother she would like to make a “new prayer.” Her mother nodded assent, whereupon Minnie gravely proceeded:—“Oh Lord, bless all the Minnies, and all the papas, and all the mamas, and all the Uncles Arthurs. Jesus, I've been vaccinated, and I guess it's going to work!”

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or Representative Papers from THE INDEX, contains the "Bird's-eye view of the 'Modern Principles,'" gives a bird's-eye view of the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—Ten Cents (New Edition).

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents a conception of him that is worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no abler, firmer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions, Path of Progress, Peace, and Interests of Europe. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution? Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, contains in full the Call for the Cincinnati Convention of the "National Reform Association," which proposes to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed to the U. S. Constitution,—the list of its most prominent supporters,—and a full exposure of the dangerous and revolutionary character of the movement. PRICE—Single copies, Five Cents; Twelve copies, Fifty Cents.

Also, The Bible Argument Against Woman Suffrage, a pungent pamphlet by A. J. GROVER, is for sale at this index office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

Address, THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

BACK NUMBERS

OF

THE RADICAL

FOR SALE CHEAP.

Parties sending to my address One Dollar or more, will receive liberal packages, according to the amount.
Address S. H. MORSE,
123-14 25 BROMFIELD ST., Boston, Mass.

F. J. SCOTT, J. H. STOFFLET,

ARCHITECTS,

78 MADISON STREET (Near Boody House), TOLEDO.
[130-131]

Back Numbers of the Index!

FOR 1870 AND 1871.

It is no longer possible to furnish a complete file of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address at

Twenty-five Cents a Dozen!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

Address THE INDEX,
Toledo, Ohio.

Free Thought Literature.

"Force and Matter," by Dr. Buchner..... $5.00
"Elsewhere, or Over the Range," The great English free thought satire..... 2.50
"The Trial of Thelam"..... 1.00
"Secular Almanac" for 1878..... .35

J. F. RUGGLES,
[141-143ew] Bronson, Mich.

THE EXAMINER.—A limited number of Nos. 1, 2, 4, and 5 will be sent postpaid—the four numbers for 50 cents. Nos. 1, 3, and 4 for 40 cents. Nos. 1 and 3 for 30 cents. No. 1 for 10 cents. What remains of full sets are reserved for binding. Zion's Herald says:—"The boldest heretic of today." The Independent says:—"The most pronounced radical in the land." The Chicago Post says:—"Equal to the utterances of Theodore Parker." Address THE EXAMINER, Winnetka, Ill., where the numbers for sale remain. [138-147]

ENGLISH AND FRENCH FAMILY AND DAY SCHOOL.

MISS C. E. NOURSE will re-open her SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES AND CHILDREN, Monday, Sept. 23. Her address during the summer will be No. 23 Deane St., Boston, and from Sept. 1 as above. [135-143.]

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

Capital, $100,000.

Shares, $100.

OFFICERS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, President.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Vice President.
P. H. BATESON, Secretary.
A. E. MACOMBER, Treasurer.

DIRECTORS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, New York, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
ANA K. BUTTS, New York, N. Y.
RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Toledo, O.
A. E. MACOMBER, " "
CALVIN CONE, " "
EDWARD BISSSELL, " "
P. H. BATESON, " "

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

Name	Address	Shares	Amount
D. B. LOCKE	Toledo, O.	Twenty	$2,000
A. E. MACOMBER	" "	Fifteen	1,500
C. CONE	" "	" "	1,500
EDWARD BISSSELL	" "	" "	1,500
F. E. ABBOT	" "	Forty	4,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY	" "	Ten	1,000
GUDON MARE	" "	" "	1,000
F. B. BATESON	" "	" "	1,000
E. F. BARNETT	" "	" "	1,000
H. E. HOWE	" "	Three	300
W. C. FISK	" "	" "	300
J. M. RITCHIE	" "	" "	300
V. KEEN	" "	" "	300
ALANSON WOOD	" "	" "	300
WILLIAM KASER	" "	Five	500
J. O. HOLZWARTH	" "	One	100
JOS. E. MARK	" "	" "	100
C. AUBARD	" "	" "	100
ASA K. BUTTS	New York, N. Y.	Thirty	3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON	Newport, R. I.	Two	200
ALEX. COCHRAN	Franklin, Pa.	Five	500
GEO. HOADLEY	Cincinnati, O.	One	100
MISS A. HALL	Northampton, Mass.	" "	100
G. N. JENNINGS	Tonika, Ill.	" "	100
J. SEDGWICK	Painesville, O.	" "	100
CARL POST	Monroe, Mich.	Three	300
HENRY MILLER	Sacramento, Cal.	Five	500
L. R. BUNDERLAND	Galucy, Mass.	One	100
L. L. WATSON	Croydon, N. H.	" "	100
LOUIS BRISTOL	Olathe, Kan.	" "	100
J. E. BUTTON	" "	" "	100
SAR. T. DURKEE	" "	" "	100
J. M. HADLEY	" "	" "	100
S. L. HILL	Florence, Mass.	Ten	1,000
W. H. SPENCER	Haverhill, Mass.	Two	200
JON. F. BARRETT	Boston, Ind.	" "	200
E. W. WEIS	La Grange, Mass.	Five	500
FRANK PRATHER	Wellesville, Kan.	One	100
E. F. DICKINSON	New York, N. Y.	Two	200
J. T. DICKINSON	Middlefield, Ct.	Fourteen	1,400
W. J. POTTER	New Bedford, Mass.	Three	300
G. C. GLATTE	Kendallville, Ind.	" "	300
C. C. GANNETT	Boston, Mass.	" "	300
MISS M. C. FRANKLIN	" "	One	100
MRS. B. EMERSON	Dover, N. H.	" "	100
MISS E. EMERSON	" "	" "	100
W. H. DOWNER	Birmingham, Ct.	" "	100
B. B. SMITH	Lansing, Mich.	" "	100
R. B. SMITH	Warren, Pa.	" "	100
W. C. RUSSEL	Ithaca, N. Y.	" "	100
C. L. CLARKE	Toledo, O.	Three	300
C. L. SMITH	" "	One	100
J. N. LYMAN	Cincinnati, O.	Twenty	2,000
L. G. FELCH	Monroe Centre, Mass.	One	100
A. FOLSON	Boston, Mass.	Three	300
S. O. BASS	Colebrook, Conn.	One	100
L. E. SEWELL	Boston, Mass.	Five	500
ELMER WRIGHT	" "	" "	500
E. B. WARD	Detroit, Mich.	Twenty	2,000
A. D. WILT	Dayton, O.	One	100
S. B. BOKER	Keokuk, Iowa	" "	100
W. E. JONES	Peekskill, N. Y.	" "	100
S. H. DANE	Oskaloosa, Iowa	" "	100
J. H. YORK	Dover, N. H.	" "	100
JOS. BATES	" "	" "	100
G. P. FOLSON	" "	" "	100
"A FRIEND"	" "	" "	100
Mrs. H. E. PERKINS	" "	Two	200
O.	Boston, Mass.	One	100
WILLIAM GREEN	Orange, N. J.	1.0	100
"A FRIEND"	Lowell, Mass.	" "	100
D. B. STEINMAN	Brattleboro, Vt.	" "	100
Mrs. F. W. CHRISTIAN	New York, N. Y.	" "	100
C. W. FABIOT	Kelley's Island, O.	Two	200
EDW. M. DAVIS	Philadelphia, Pa.	One	100
Mrs. LUCRETIA MOTT	" "	" "	100
MISS M. A. WRIGHT	Jersey City, N. J.	" "	100
A. S. BROWN	Worcester, Mass.	" "	100
EDWIN BROWN	" "	" "	100
R. F. HOLLOWELL	Boston, Mass.	Five	500
BEN. BODMAN	New Bedford, Mass.	Three	300
H. B. CLARKE	" "	" "	300
FRANK J. SCOTT	Toledo, O.	Six	600
M. L. HOLBROOK	Houlton, Me.	Ten	1,000
W. H. BOGDUNTON	New York, N. Y.	One	100
HENRY H. RICHARDSON	" "	" "	100
E. G. BUNNETT	Webster, Mass.	Two	200
J. E. FOLLETT	Winona, Minn.	One	100
JOS. WARRASSE	Newton, N. J.	" "	100
T. M. LANE	Franklin, Pa.	" "	100
W. H. DYER	Worcester, Mass.	" "	100
W. H. SPALDING	Prairie du Chien, Wis.	" "	100
LOUIS BELMONT	Duluth, Minn.	" "	100
LEWIS KURTZ	Philadelphia, Pa.	Two	200
SAM'L WARRASSE	Augusta, Kan.	One	100
W. L. RATHIE	La Fayette, N. J.	" "	100
W. EMERSON	Amesbury, Mass.	" "	100
C. H. HORSCH	Boston, Mass.	" "	100
MISS I. THOMSON	Dover, N. H.	Two	200
BENJ. HOLLOWELL	Sandy Spring, Md.	One	100
Mrs. M. R. VAN RENSWAER	N. Y. City	" "	100
R. B. STONE	Warren, Penn.	" "	100
WM. ROTCH	Fall River, Mass.	Two	200
Mrs. J. WHITAKER	New Bedford, Mass.	Five	500
S. H. ROVER	Kerhonkson, N. Y.	One	100
Mrs. R. D. FRANCIS	Boston Highlands, Mass.	Two	200
CHAS. BOWALL	New York, N. Y.	One	100
G. H. BRIDGES	Salem, O.	" "	100
J. T. CLARKSON	Amesbury, Mass.	Two	200
C. W. NEWTON	Castleton, Ill.	One	100
HENRY KIRBY	Toledo, O.	Two	200
OTTO KLEME	" "	One	100
H. G. NEUBERT	" "	Two	200
A. HUNERT	" "	One	100
TOLEDO PRINTING	Detroit, Mich.	Thirty	3,000
T. K. PECK	Co. Toledo, O.	Thirty	3,000
	Westminster, Ct.	Two	200

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

With offices at 90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 23 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Weston super Mare, Eng.
Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Send $2.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

New Tracts!

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition.

FIRST SERIES.....No. 1 to No. 25

SECOND SERIES.....No. 26 to No. 50

Either Series, 50 Cents; Both, $1.00

Address CHAS. E. WHIPPLE,
[38-38] 19 PINEBET ST., BOSTON.

GIVEN AWAY

TO ANY BOOK AGENT,

A $5.00 GREENBACK

AND A SPECIMEN OF THE

GREAT INDUSTRIES

OF THE UNITED STATES.

1300 PAGES AND 500 ENGRAVINGS.

PRINTED IN ENGLISH AND GERMAN.

Written by 30 Eminent Authors, including Horace Greeley and John B. Gough.

We want Agents in every town to solicit orders for this work, on liberal terms. It sells to all classes, and no library should be without it. It is a complete history of all branches of industry, processes of manufactures, etc. No like work ever before published. One agent sold 138 in eight days, another 338 in two weeks. An early application will secure a choice in territory. Full particulars and terms will be sent free, with a specimen of this Great Work, and a $5 Greenback.

J. B. BURR & HYDE, Hartford, Conn.
[136-151.]

SALESMEN WANTED

I wish to employ as

COMMERCIAL TRAVELERS

three young men of good character, industrious habits and fair address. Must be hearty radicals and glad to devote spare time to canvassing for THE INDEX. State particulars as to experience, references and expectations.

Address A. K. BUTTS,
Care Lock Box 38,
Toledo, Ohio.

HALL'S

MAGIC SHADE FIXTURES!

An ingenious arrangement by which a Shade may be rolled down from the top, or raised from the bottom of the window, or both, as may be desired; thus securing PERFECT VENTILATION, GOOD LIGHT, and at the same time COMPLETE PRIVACY in the room.

They are an admirable and cheap substitute for Inside Blinds.

Are easily attached to Shades now in use. Are especially adapted for Office and Store Windows.

For sale by dealers in shades generally.

MANUFACTURED BY THE

CHICAGO CURTAIN FIXTURE COMPANY.

101 WEST LAKE ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

[1371]

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 10) will be sent postpaid on receipt of sixty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word;") "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. ABBOT. This series contains in the aggregate over two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter. Address THE INDEX, Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

FOR ENGLISH AND AMERICAN BOOKS of all kinds, send to J. F. RUGGLES, Bronson, Mich. [135eww]

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 14, 1872.

WHOLE NO. 142.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS KILLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH ROBINSON, WILLIAM J. POSTER, RICHARD P. HALLGREN, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MISS S. D. CLEMENT, REV. CHARLES VOTAW (England), PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), REV. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.
F. H. BATESON, Business Agent.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

On the Vision of Heaven.

BY PROFESSOR FRANCIS W. NEWMAN.

In the present state of philosophy and science, of belief and unbelief, it is not at all easy to learn what is the conception, the scene, the pictorial view concerning a future state of existence, which any particular Christian, whose professed creed we know, practically and really entertains; but we can hardly mistake, in a broad and historical view, the outlines of thought and imagination which have prevailed. As certain rude tribes have believed in a world where hunting ground is plentiful and full of game, and the hunter has no lack of dog or horse; as Moslems have pictured to themselves a Paradise peopled with black-eyed and beautiful nymphs; as the intelligent Greek (with less vivid and constant assurance indeed) believed their chief heroes and wise men to dwell in certain isles of the ocean, rid of human cares and quarrels, but free for martial sport and majestic dance, for converse with sages, or listening to music, song and science,—even so surely have Christians for near eighteen hundred years prevalently upheld certain definite conceptions of a future world, on which we can speak in some detail. It is not necessary to dwell on that detestable side of the question, the "Tartarus" which they derived from Greeks and Romans, if not rather from an Egyptian or Asiatic fountain, and certainly did not improve. The hell of Virgil was a mere purgatory, an infliction salutary and restorative; by which "Ingrained wickedness was washed out or burned out." Christians also admitted this idea, but coupled it with a far more horrible alternative, which numbers of Protestants, happily, are now resolutely disowning. But I pass to the Christian ideal of heaven. It is built primarily on the assumption that the worship in the church is a type of the celestial world. Dr. Watts' hymn puts into the mouth of a good child the correlative comparison of the church-worship to heaven:

"I have been there (to church), and still will go;
"Tis like a little heaven below."

God Almighty sits aloft, listening to his own praises from the mouth of his angels and saints, who (as the Apocalypse expresses it) have no rest day or night, but harp and sing forever. But besides the hymn to the thrice holy Lord God Almighty, a second object calls for praise,—the Lamb, who is in the midst of the throne of God. Here is an eminently new conception, and one characteristically Christian. Jesus, now glorified as the Lamb, is the ideal of pure, saintly, affectionate manhood, who, though no longer flesh, yet retains human features and human voice, so that his redeemed can read his sentiments in the play of his countenance, as well as receive instruction from his words. He is believed to love every saint, and to have loved him before the foundation of the world, with a love that surpasses the human not in intensity only, but also in wisdom and purity; having accepted them from his Father as the reward of his labors, and having therewith undertaken the task of training them to perfect holiness.

This is the cardinal point of the high Christian thought. Sin is the saint's daily vexation, worse by far than suffering, while suffering, in whatever form, is most harassing as the occasion of sin. The great mass of men and women, in subordinate stations and having to sustain life by labor, are liable to frets from wrong or insult, ordinarily petty but sometimes severe, besides trials various in kind and countless in number from the calamities or misconduct of those either near and dear, or assuming to be near, when not dear. Each Christian subjected to the wear and tear of constant struggle, and trying to maintain gentleness and dignity, sweetness of spirit and serenity, thankfulness to God and love to man, is daily made conscious of a sad falling below his sincere efforts, and sighs out perpetually—"Oh for more grace!" Neither more prosperity nor more celebrity nor more ease nor more freedom (however highly such things may be valued) is the burden of his heart's cry to God, but more "grace." Such is the conventional phrase for more moral ability to bear the unreasonableness or cruelty of man and the casualties of life, as God and one's conscience would have us bear them. Hence the primary idea of heaven is a place and state of rest from sin and suffering; a place where we shall not be agonized by the sight of woes which we are unable to relieve, nor stung in conscience for possible selfishness when we turn away from them in despair; a place where no tyranny frets us into unamiable retaliation, no want goads us into unworthy compliance or cowardly silence, for a righteous rule is universal. The Sun of Righteousness has risen with healing in his wings. There our hungering and thirsting after righteousness shall be fully appeased; for the Lamb himself, the centre of God's grace and goodness, shall lead us to living fountains. Neither sin nor the occasion of sin shall remain, but holiness shall be perfected in all. No sin of others shall afflict us, no sin of our own shall separate us from communion with God; but Peace, the fruit of righteousness, shall make our union with the Almighty Source of Holiness constant, conscious and fertile in unutterable joy.

Let me for a moment contrast this Christian anticipation of heaven with the ideal future state which Cicero puts forward in the first book of his very elaborate Tusculan Disputations: and Cicero, on many very solid grounds, deserves high honor in the historical chain of European moralists. From his other writings we know that he was unable to maintain any fixed belief concerning future existence, and, as he puts his thoughts into the mouths of others, these cannot in any case be quoted as his convictions; yet it is evident that he is trying to elevate the conception, and put forth a worthy ideal. He professes inability to receive the gross opinion that the soul is the blood or the heart or any of the vitals, and he cannot understand what is meant by saying that it is the harmony of the physical actions, which seems to be only a metaphor: he believes it to have a substantive existence, but to be very subtle; at least as subtle as inflamed air. Hence, when released from the body by death, it rises aloft through the atmosphere until it reaches a stratum of its own density. There it rests, and feeds on the same ethereal food which supports the life of the stars; and delights itself perpetually with intellectual contemplation. (I have not Cicero's words within reach, and must quote from memory; but I think that he names three sciences as his ideal of contemplation.)

The action on the mind produced by any vision by no means wholly depends on the scene being believed to be real. The nature of the scene itself may greatly impress us for good or evil. How delicious, how much coveted, is the view from our windows of some beautiful distant landscape, some lake, some bay of the sea shut in by hills, some horizon on which the colors of sunset may be seen! How pleasant to see the blue sky; how impressive, awe-striking and calming is a clear view of the stars by night! Whether there is any personal relation between us and these distant scenes, is quite a secondary question. The sight of a nook of lofty mountain,—say, of some craggy region embosomed by snow—is not the less delightful because we are never to inhabit it, nor because we should shudder to ascend to it. We are often aware that the beauty would be greatly impaired by nearness. The picture landscape on our walls does not the less soothe the spirit and perhaps exhilarate us, though we happen to know that it is a fancy composition of the artist, with no true original. So, too, when we see in the clouds magnificent structures, silver and purple domes, and mountainous forms, it is true that we should admire them still more if we supposed them to endure perpetually in their present aspect; yet their tendency to calm, cheer and steady the mind is not destroyed by our knowledge of their evanescence.

When we consider all these phenomena, it becomes clear that, in proportion as the imagination of any people dwells upon the vision of a future state, it will be affected for good or evil by the nature of the scene contemplated, and that, out of proportion to the fixed certainty of belief. Hence, if an ancient Greek imagined that the prowess of an Achilles, however selfish, proud, vindictive and cruel, entitled him to a place in the Islands of the Blessed—though the belief were poetical and unsteady—it might give baneful impulse (as it is said to have done) to the warlike ambition of an Alexander. If it be true that the Mohammedan, in proportion to the fervor of his faith, regards the company of black-eyed damsels to be the chief enjoyment of Paradise, and death in battle against infidels to be a sure title of admission to Paradise; then such a vision of the future must have a sensual and ferocious tendency.

Now the peculiarity of the Christian vision (of course, I mean, excluding hell) is, that it has no form nor comeliness to the worldly mind, the fierce or hard heart, the meanly ambitious, nor to any who are absorbed in self and contented in sin. Many a scoffer (long before my excellent friend, M. D. Conway, was born) has said of it:—"It is tiresome enough to sing long hymns at church; I should not at all like to be harping and trumpeting day and night on a cloud." No doubt the idea is puerile: church ordinances cannot be made the whole of a life without utter moral ruin, nor can they reasonably and wisely become the sole ideal of a future scene. But no Christian really makes them such. The scoffer does not go on to confess, yet it is none the less true, that he has no pleasure in anticipating a land of universal holiness, where every eye looks up with love and joy to the guiding countenance of a righteous Lord. It needs a heart essentially in love with holiness, whatever its sins from bursts of uncontrolled passion, to make the Christian heaven seem desirable; and even if, as Virgil says of Æneas, one "feed the heart on a vain picture," the nature of the picture is here such as to improve the heart which feeds on it. Those who have never been Christians in a spiritual sense, perhaps ill understand how it combines unselfishness with a sense of the communion of saints and union with God in Christ. A young Christian who, perhaps for the first time, receives the "Lord's Supper" in what he supposes to be a choice collection of saintly communicants from the hands of a peculiarly saintly minister, has an inexpressible delight by mere presence in so select an assembly. No one of them knows him; he does not desire to be known; he seeks no introductions; but he feels that everything around him is sacred. No profane heart mars his conscious sympathy with those whom he believes to be in close spiritual union with the Almighty and the thrice Holy. A thrilling sense of joy which may mount into transport suggests to him what will be the blessedness of that state where all hearts are in harmony with God, and thereby with one another. To impute as selfishness the desire that such a "kingdom of God" may "come,"—the desire to see its realization—is surely a very great mistake. The desire was plainly uttered, long before the Christian Era, in the Hebrew Psalms:—"Remember me, O Lord, with the favor that thou bearest unto thy people: O visit me with thy salvation; that I may see the felicity of the chosen ones and rejoice in the gladness of thy heritage."

There is here no vulgar notion of thrones and crowns and sitting on an upper seat, which, scattered here and there in the New Testament, damages the doctrine, and does but gratify ambition; there is no exaltation of self; but, as a mother desires to see the happiness and honor of her son, most unselfishly, so does the spiritual Christian aspire to see the reign of righteousness and holiness triumphant. Faith in such a Paradise, just in proportion as it can be sustained, seems to me undeniably sanctifying and ennobling.

One of the compensating advantages which the rude in mind have over the cultivated and logical is that, where a belief has moral excellence combined with logical weakness, the rudely-minded can appropriate and retain the moral good, unaware of the intellectual difficulties. The intellectual man often earns clearness and definiteness of thought at the expense of warmth, and, if this is inevitable, the price must be paid. It is a first principle of genuine faith that falsehood and error are not so good as truth, however edifying they may seem. As beautiful visions, they may have an ennobling tendency; yet, if they be confidently accepted as true, while they are not true, the falsehood is sure to propagate evil. I am inclined to believe that many Christians who are still in their own consciousness true believers in this heaven, yet, as they grow older and more thoughtful, and seek to realize more definitely the glorious picture of that which is to be, by their very effort to possess their minds with it, dissipate it as a gorgeous mist. It occurs to them to ask:—"Will the Lamb, with whom we are to walk in the Paradise of God, be, like Jesus of Nazareth, of the size of a man? How, then, can the myriad millions of the redeemed be in local nearness to him? Or if he is to be, like the sun in the heavens, a vast, distant and brilliant object, what would his human features avail us? After all, is it not a materializing of Deity to ascribe to it the form of man? Is not faith, in its very essence, higher than sight,—the one being spiritual and characteristic of the holy, the other external and common to the spiritual and unspiritual? If we must maintain this now, is it not eternally true? Must we not then accept as metaphor only all about the Lamb on Mount Zion, equally as the jewelled city of New Jerusalem, as lofty as it is broad and wide,—the cubical city, of which the same Apocalypse talks?" By such doubts and queries the simple and hearty faith of youth is undermined in maturer age.

When we look at the subject in the free light of unbiased inquiry, it is obvious to add that such a being as man can have no room for holiness in a world which has no room for action. Intellect, affection, action, sympathy, make up that morality of which holiness is the tender glorification. While the heaven of Cicero was all intellect, the heaven of the American Indian all action, the heaven of historical Christianity is all devout sentiment. But no one of these separately can be the true heaven. A careless reader of this paper might suppose that the writer is recommending the Christian belief concerning heaven to be absolute truth; but on the contrary it seems to him that at the utmost it can only be a fragment of truth, inasmuch as it is one-sided,—to waive all other objections and questions hard to answer. Action must have an object; it implies unsatisfied desire, wants that are felt. It may reasonably be doubted whether a total absence of pain, an impossibility of suffering, is compatible—we need not urge, with a frame susceptible of pleasure from without, but—with care for others, and with sympathy. The idea that pain is totally excluded from heaven assumes that pain in itself, and in whatever degree, is an essential evil; which certainly casts censure upon the Creator of this world, and is in many ways refuted by moral considerations. When pain conduces to moral advancement, it must be accounted a good; and it does most visibly exercise and cement affection, and excite gratitude and love so eminently as to suggest that, if the higher moral attachments of one finite being to another are to exist in heaven, occasional pain and want and feebleness cannot be excluded. Nay, we may go further, and doubt most seriously whether, in a modified and milder sense, sin is not essential to the finite being. The writer of the book of Job says boldly—"God putteth no trust in his servants, and his angels he chargeth with folly." So John in the Apocalypse makes the heavenly host say to the most High—"Thou only art Holy." For to moral perfection, in its absolute sense, perfect knowledge and wisdom of judgment, and an all-powerful will, seem to be essentially prerequisite. Man's virtue, as known to us, is progressive; and to imagine that by death the human being can leap into absolute divine perfection, is certainly very unpalatable. Higher and higher progress is all that can be reasonably hoped for; and progress implies that the present state is imperfect. Only, imperfection needs not to be degradation, as in the case of a young man who falls below the virtue which may be reasonably expected of him; it may be comparable rather to the errors and weakness of a good child, who is as wise and virtuous as his years will allow.

For these reasons I do not think that the most spiritual idea of heaven which is strictly Christian can justify itself to sober thought, nor can be long maintained in energy by thoughtful Christians: but those who wish to refute it must first do it justice.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

CAMP-MEETING NOTES.

BY SIDNEY H. MORSE.

On waking this morning, I heard a voice, seemingly in the distance, saying, "Jesus!" My half-conscious thought was that I must have already reached the camp-ground. I soon discovered that I was still in a snug little room in which were two beds, and that the man opposite was putting on his boots. It appeared that he was afflicted with rheumatic feet. Over night they had swollen, so that his boots were a tight fit.

"I have the most un-Christly luck whenever I come to camp-meeting," quoth he.

"Indeed! By all the promises held out, your luck should prove just the contrary," was my reply.

He shook his head and groaned; I was sorry for him. But had he really been so fortunate as to have had "un-Christly luck," one might have congratulated him, deeming it a spiritual emancipation. But, no, it was only an emphatic phrase of his to signify the height and depth of his misfortune. He was a "believer in the Christian plan." He held to the great "scheme," as was made manifest during the day. He hoped not to die unconverted. He was past forty, and there was danger in delay. But the trouble was he found it next to impossible to realize how great a sinner he was.

"One has to feel he's a lost sinner, as well as believe it, before he'll go forward," said he.

One said to him that perhaps his feelings were not disposed to belie the fact. "Do you honestly think that you are a great sinner?"

He had to confess that he had never done anything that he could say was very bad. "But then, of course I am a sinner: we all are sinners."

"Theologically speaking?"

"Yes, according to the Bible. If we are not sinners, where's the use of salvation? What becomes of religion?"

He must needs grasp both horns of the dilemma. A well-disposed and well-behaved man in the main, and yet a "miserable sinner," or Christ was of no effect.

A drive of thirty minutes takes one from Hyannis to the Yarmouth Camp. It is half past ten, and the meeting has just begun. The grounds have an enticing look, and the avenues are pleasant to loiter in. But it is time for the sermon and pleasure must be abandoned for profit.

"And may the Holy Spirit baptize our young brother!" are the words I catch as I take my seat in the circle.

The young man is of good appearance. He will speak of "the profitability of prayer." I listen a reasonable time, and then debate with myself if I shall escape into the quiet of the grove beyond. I decide to remain and hear the sermon through.

How it happened I could not tell, but I am sensible that his voice is dying away, and that, like Paul, I have done the very thing I determined not to do. I am out of sight and sound.

I follow my feet, and wind about whither they will go, and wonder if the young preacher has seen that letter by Professor Tyndall's friend.

Suddenly, as the path sweeps round some tents, I come back to the meeting directly in the rear of the stand. "He holds out marvellously," I think, and I listen.

"I know 'tis the fashion now-a-days for philosophy to give new and sometimes very beautiful definitions of prayer. For instance, we are told that prayer has only a spiritual significance, and that prayer is answered by our own efforts, the very act itself lifting us into the presence of Deity, who, like the sun, forever shineth and giveth His blessing to the children of men if they will thus place themselves in a receptive condition. But, friends, let us not be deceived. This is not the definition of prayer you find in the Bible. God there declares that 'whatsoever ye ask, it shall be granted unto you, if ye ask in faith.' And he will answer prayer for physical effects as well as spiritual. Who was it made the sun pause and stand still in the heavens? Who stopped the mouths of the lions? Who healed the sick, and broke open prison doors? No: I do not give up my prayer-answering God."

I have given his words as they lie in my memory, and have done him, I believe, no injustice.

I am impressed with the idea that this young man's notion of prayer is much nearer to Orthodoxy than that of the more cultivated writer in the columns of The Spectator. This man evidently believes that, if you pray for a sick man earnestly and in full faith, God will make him well again. When the Prince of Wales recovered, whatever the doctors attending him may have thought, who doubts but three fourths of the people of Great Britain attributed the result to the large amount of praying done in the United Kingdom and elsewhere in his behalf? Why do the believers refuse Professor Tyndall's "prayer gauge?" Is it not because they all fear that the good God will act his own pleasure, as he always does, and "send his rain on the just and the unjust,"—that is, treat the praying-hospital and the non-praying hospital both alike?

It is time for the afternoon service. I have hopes that the preacher this time will not be a young man. He is not. He takes a fine thought for the basis of his discourse—"Man's relation to the universe." His opening is encouraging. His short, pithy sentences have a tinge of inspiration; he says things, instead of talking about them. What he says I shall not be able to report. 'Tis an exalted pean of the dignity of man.

What is it I hear? Is it the same voice?

"Avaunt, Darwin! Avaunt, Darwin! You may trace your ancestry from an ape, but I have God for my father, Jesus Christ for my brother, and angels for my companions."

Strange man! Has not Darwin got the same, if he wants them? Isn't God the monkey's father as well as yours?

What is it he says now?

"I stand upon the apex of sixty centuries!"

Indeed! Will you let Darwin examine that apex, please? If he does not find monkeys at the base—but you wouldn't believe it, if your eyes beheld them, for it is not recorded in Scripture!

The evening shades are falling.

"Thank you, sir!"

A man has put into my hands a pamphlet—"The Boston Pulpit." I will sit down and look it over.

"The Simplicity that is in Christ," is the title of the sermon, and the preacher writes in a thoughtful and forcible manner. He considers "the simplicity of the plan of salvation." "There are three links to the chain: God, Christ, man. Christ is the middle link, joining the other two."

If you had become hopelessly crippled in your business, so that you were just on the brink of failure, would you not consider it a very easy and simple solution of the difficulty, if some trustworthy and wealthy capitalist were to come into the firm with you, and meet the liabilities, and get you again on good footing? That is precisely what our Lord Jesus Christ did. Man was insolvent in his obligations to God. An eternal bankruptcy of being was impending over him. Christ paid the debt."

I remember my friend of the morning of the tight boots,—how he found it exceedingly difficult to realize that he was actually spiritually bankrupt. And I recall some of the passing thoughts I had at the time.

"He knows very well," thought I, "that he is a respectable man, fit for good society here. If he has courage and cheer sufficient for this world's need, why does he stand in fear of the next? Did he expect to continue evermore living here, he would never even think of 'salvation.' Why does he want a 'ticket to glory' when that glory is in the other world, any more than when it is found here in this world? Is he not his own ticket here? Can he gain admission into places of respect and honor here 'for Christ's sake,' if he is known to be, and openly confesses that he is, 'wholly unworthy?' Why is there such a difference in the two worlds? Is not a bundle of 'filthy rags' the same in heaven as on earth? Why may not 'filthy rags' be as much respected here as in heaven—for Christ's sake?"

"For Christ's sake!"

"I know not how it is with others, but for one I prefer travelling on my own hook through this world and through the next. If anywhere in this wide universe, as I journey on, there is a place where I am of myself unworthy to be admitted, swing the gates to! I may enter for Christ's sake? Nay, St. Peter; I go my way."

But this is pride, saith our preacher:—"There is no sentiment more manly and instinctive than that of self-dependence. . . . We admire and honor self-reliance in matters of human attainment, and instinctively revolt from the idea of being the mere workmanship of another. Now the great art of the Tempter is to get us to trust the really praiseworthy and noble qualities, as applied to earthly things, into religion, so that we shall insist on being the architect of our own salvation." And the preacher calls this the "heroic impossibility." And the only reason he gives is the Bible-supported declaration that "God has chosen to save men without their aid"—if they will only permit him to do so.

I am not satisfied. I think I shall have still to believe in the "Tempter." His message is that the "really praiseworthy and noble quality as applied to earthly things" applies with equal force to things which are heavenly. Saved here, saved there: in either case the only question is—Is the timber sound? How strange would sound the reply—"No; rotten wood be counted as good as sound in heaven, for Christ's sake!"

A praying-band from Troy, N. Y., has the platform for the evening. I have heard them elsewhere. I am not attracted by them. But they will create much excitement and "lead many to Christ." I cannot forbear to say what I am sure others altogether friendly to this work must have noticed, that the leader of this band is as fine a specimen of pious-mush as one cares to see. He drools the most sickly sentiment. How any one can get "converted" under his ministrations, I cannot even imagine. But let me not speak uncharitably. He means well, I dare say. Certain others of the band have a more manly tone, and their "experience" is not without interest.

Among the stories told during the day, I recall one:—"I'm glad," said a little boy, "I've got a praying-mother." "Why, my little son?" "Because, when I go to heaven, God will know my name; for mother's told it to him a great many times."

It was very pretty in the boy, considering how he had been taught. But how sorry one felt for the childish man when he exclaimed:—"Ah, may God know all our names when we go to heaven!"

It is nine o'clock and after. Nearly time to depart.

Here comes a young man up the path between the benches. He stops not far off, and stands for some time. At length he addresses a youth of about his own age. Their conversation runs about as follows:—

"Do you love Jesus?"

"I suppose I do—some."

"Don't you know?"

"I suppose I do."

"Do you believe in religion?"

"I suppose so."

"Does your mother pray for you?"

"I suppose she does."

"Don't you know that, if you die as you are, you will be lost?"

"I suppose so; that is what you say!"

"Won't you come and be prayed for?"

"No!"

"I shall pray for you."

And the young soldier goes back to his place. He had done his duty as he conceived it. It was a real cross for him to speak. It was an heroic effort. One felt kindly towards him, and no doubt arises but that he will be saved for his own sake.

A speaker states that, at a certain camp-meeting, a vote was taken to see how old the different Christians were when they "gave their souls to God." It was found that much the larger number did so under the age of fourteen. The number decreased as the ages ran up. Very few were counted after forty.

And this reminds me that during the day I saw a man with coat sleeves up to his elbows, exhorting a circle of listeners. He cried:—"Will you come at once? You may not live a day, an hour, a minute. God knows. If you die this moment, you will go to hell and take up your portion there forever." Two little "miserable sinners"—ten-year-old boys—crept forward, the one brisily, the other trembling with fright and sobbing. I should say they were very good boys as they were, and, if God had a place reserved for such in hell, there is one place too many in the universe for his good name. Let him fill the hole up as high as heaven, and sow it with flowers.

THE CONTEST TO CONTROL THE SCHOOLS.

[From the New York Nation.]

The corrective for the danger here discussed is an enlightened public opinion, and this has already begun to be formed. The evil has been often pointed out, and is widely recognized; and we think we are not mistaken in saying that it is already less threatening than it was five years ago. The other danger specified is fundamental and vital, touching not the character of the schools, but their very existence. It finds its best expression, of course, in the doctrine of the Catholic Church, which makes the church the necessary foundation of every human institution; but it exists no less in every form of Protestantism which demands to be recognized in public education. The first and most consistent shape which it took was opposition to the very existence of a free-school system, but it was soon driven to more subtle and circuitous forms of antagonism. The free school is so firmly seated in the American mind as an essential part of American institutions, that to try to overthrow it is labor wasted. Catholic schools, Jewish schools, Swedenborgian schools, German schools—every school which represents a single religious faith, or a single element of our compound nationality—are but an ineffectual protest against the system, and do not touch its vitality any more than any other private schools. Foiled in the effort to overthrow the system, it next aimed, with equal ill success, to divide it; at present the struggle, a much more perilous one, is to control. The controversy over the use of the Bible in schools is but a contest for the control of the schools—between Protestantism, which possesses this control by tradition, and Catholicism, which demands it as of right. We cannot wonder that an attempt to subvert a custom so revered, and of such historical prestige, should be earnestly resisted, and that the custom should be claimed as a fundamental and inherent part of the system. But it should be remembered that the nation is made up of those who are its citizens now, and that it is not at present—however it may have been in the past—a Protestant nation, except so far as a nation is represented by its majority. It should be remembered, too, that if the majority to-day and here has a right to insist upon the use of King James' Version, the majority next year, and in another place, will have an equal right to insist upon the Douai Version.

In view of the vital contest which has arisen upon this point, we see no hope for the maintenance of genuine public schools except in making them purely and avowedly secular. It may truly be said that the public school system serves as a moral bond for our entire community, just as the visible church did in the Middle Ages. That age was essentially theological, and found its expression in an ecclesiastical unity; our age has no common ground of religious opinion, and can only meet upon the undisputed truths of science. Secular education is, therefore, the only consistent object of our public schools: theological dogmas should be left to the church, the family, and Sunday-schools of the several denominations.

Neither need we fear that the schools will foster immorality if the formal devotional exercises of the opening hour are omitted. We have very little faith in any great good accomplished by these formal devotions, or by formal instructions in morality. It is urged that it is the well-instructed who recruit our most dangerous classes of criminals, and that this shows that we should have more religious and moral instruction in our schools. Are we to understand that the criminals in question have never been taught that there is a God, or that stealing is a crime, and that they do not know these truths as well as a professor of theology? It is not by set precepts or by elaborate lectures on morality that boys are trained to virtue, but by the daily exhibition of moral conduct, and the constant and insensible inculcation of the principles of morality in everyday relations. There is not a well-conducted recitation in any school in the land which does not teach at every step that virtue is its own reward, that honesty is the best policy, and that in the long run fraud does not pay. We beg for this view of a much-vexed and highly important question the careful attention of every friend of the system.

MORMON SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

[By Rev. H. C. Trumbull, in the Christian Union.]

The Mormon Sunday School system is as complete as every other agency for Mormon church-extension and indoctrination. Every ward in each city, and every settlement in the territory, is supposed to have its Sunday school, the superintendent of which is appointed by the president of the district, or the bishop of the ward. The Sunday school sessions are usually in the morning. In Salt Lake City they are at the same hour as the Tabernacle service. In Ogden, they precede it, and the schools, on closing, are marched in procession to the Tabernacle to have a part in the worship there. The Sunday school opening exercises consist of singing, prayer, and occasionally of Bible reading. The classes are taught in the Mormon catechism, the Book of Mormon, and the Bible. The closing exercises are singing, prayer, addresses, and sometimes a general catechizing of the school from the desk.

No pains are spared to fully instruct the children in the Mormon doctrines and belief. "Jacques' Catechism," in general use in the schools, presents all the blasphemous claims of "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints," as these people style themselves. Presenting something of Bible truth, it runs through the whole tissue of Mormon folly and falsehood. For example:—

"Q. Has God given many revelations to men?"

A. Yes, a great number.

Q. Where have we any account of his doing so?

A. In the Bible, the Book of Mormon, the Book of Doctrines and Covenants, and other publications of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

Q. Name one of these revelations recorded in the Old Testament.

A. The Lord revealed himself to Abraham, and talked with him as one man talks with another.—Gen. xviii: 1-5.

Q. Is there any account in the Book of Mormon of God revealing himself to man?

A. Yes. The Lord showed himself to the brother of Jared.—Book of Ether, i: 8.

Q. Is any account given, in any other publication of the Latter Day Saints, of God revealing himself to any person in our day?

A. Yes. The Lord revealed himself and his Son Jesus Christ to Joseph Smith.—History of Joseph Smith, Times and Seasons, Vol. III, page 748, etc.

Q. When and how was this dispensation commenced?

A. About the year 1820, whilst Joseph Smith, who then lived in Manchester, Ontario county,

New York, was praying to the Lord to teach him the true religion, a vision of the heavens opened unto him, two glorious persons descended towards him, and one, pointing to the other, said, "This is my beloved Son, hear him."

Q. Who were these two persons?

A. God the Father, and his Son Jesus Christ.

Q. Did Joseph Smith, before his death, bestow all the keys and powers of the Holy Priesthood upon the Twelve Apostles?

A. Yes; every key that was necessary to save and exalt mankind in the celestial kingdom of God.—Mill. Star, Vol. X, page 115.

Q. What is the First Presidency?

A. Three, chosen from those who hold the High Priesthood and Apostleship, to preside over and direct the affairs of the whole Church. This quorum consists of a President of the office of the High Priesthood, and two Counsellors. The duty of the President is to preside over the whole Church, and to be a Seer, a Revelator, a Translator, and a Prophet.—Doc. and Cov., Vol. III, page 11-42.

Q. Who are the First Presidency of the Church?

A. Brigham Young, President; George A. Smith, and Daniel H. Wells, Counsellors."

A small boy arose at a Sunday school concert and began quite glibly:—"A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho and fell—and fell—his memory here began to fail him—and—and—fell by the roadside, and the thorns sprang up and choked him."

Dr. Prime, one of the editors of the New York Observer, predicts that within the life of some one now living there will be a union of the Evangelical churches in New York.—Union Advocate.

The threat of what is called hell is little or nothing to me, and the lure of what is called heaven is little or nothing to me.—Walt, Whitman.

"Come into the Varden, Maud," is the way in which musical mammae urge their daughters to try on their new calico dresses.—Chicago Post.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at OGDON HALL, St. Clair Street, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Cash Receipts for the week ending September 7th.—Mrs. Jno. J. Bagley, $5.30; R. P. Hallowell, $5.00; Parker Pillsbury, $1.50; Jos. Singer, 50 cts.; Louis H. Prince, $2; H. W. Nichol, $2; Matt. H. Ellis, $2; Mrs. J. G. Kinley, $11.50; Joseph T. White, $50.00; J. C. Allen, 50 cts.; H. W. Stanton, 50 cts.; E. H. Brown, 50 cts.; George Houghton, $2; G. L. Hall, $1; Rev. G. P. Whitfield, $5; R. Blair, 50 cts.; Robert See, $2; Dr. R. Hutchinson, $1; Rutger B. Miller, $2; Henry L. White, $1; Alphons Dove, 50 cts.; Philip Swartztrauber, $2; A. Fowler, 50 cts.; J. C. Wolf, 50 cts.; H. K. Sollick, 50 cts.; M. L. Wellish, 50 cts.; John Ordway, $1; H. Birney, $1; Bruno Lamoureux, 50 cts.; J. L. Roberts, $1; W. H. Plank, $1; Melvin F. Stephenson, $1; M. Lawrence, 50 cts.; Jno. H. Anderson, 50 cts.; Levi Cooper, 50 cts.; F. E. Bacon, 50 cts.; Jno. Harrison, $1; James Elder, Mts.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Trans or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

N. B.—THE INDEX is payable in advance. Its friends should not be offended if the paper is stopped at the expiration of their terms as indicated by the mail-tags. We have no means of knowing whether they wish it continued or not except by the receipt or non-receipt of the subscription price.

N. B.—Please examine the ADDRESS and DATE on your INDEX mail-tag, and report at once any error in either.

N. B.—If your INDEX mail-tag is not changed within three weeks after renewing your subscription, please notify us immediately. But do not write before the expiration of that time.

N. B.—In case of any error in your mail-tag, always state the post-office at which the paper is received, and also the name just as it is now printed. Then state any desired corrections.

N. B.—Please remit by post-office money-order, by registered letter, or by draft on New York. Cheques on Interior banks are liable to discount, and the term of subscription will be proportionally shortened in the credit.

N. B.—When writing about a former remittance, always give the date of such remittance as exactly as possible.

N. B.—Postage on THE INDEX is five cents per quarter, deducted from receipt of the first number, payable in advance at the place of delivery.

RECEIVED.

RELIGION VIEWED AS DEVOUT OBEEDIENCE TO THE LAWS OF THE UNIVERSE. By MARY MAGUIE—THE MYTHOS OF THE ABE. By J. W. LARK.—THE BENNETT JUDGMENT. By THOMAS LUMBER STANBRO.—THE NEW DOGMA. By GAZELLE BROWN.—TRUTH FOR THE TIMES. By FRANK ELLINGWOOD ABBOTT.—All published by THOMAS SCOTT, Esq., Mount Pleasant, Bangor, England.

"THE LIGHT AND THE TRUTH." A Guide for Confirmation of Israelitish Youth. By Dr. S. H. SONNENBERG, Rabbi of the Congregation "Shaare Emeth," St. Louis, Mo. NEW WEST OFFICE, 311 Market Street. 1871.

REPORT OF A VISIT TO THE STOUT AND POKES INDIANS ON THE MISSOURI RIVER, made by WILLIAM WELSH, July, 1872. Washington: GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE. 1872.

THE RELIGIOUS MAGAZINE AND MONTHLY REVIEW. September, 1872. Boston: LEONARD C. BOWLES, 36 Bromfield St. $3.00 a year.

THE OHIO MEDICAL AND SURGICAL REPORTER. July, 1872. Cleveland, Ohio: L. H. WYTER, 19 Monument Park. $1.20 a year.

MESSENGER. Blatt für freies stilles Leben. Eigenthümer: Herausgeber und Redakteur, PAUL SCHULTZ. September, 1872. $1.00 jährlich.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000.

SHARES PAID $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 30, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED elsewhere, Seven Hundred and Fifty Shares.				$75,000
JOHN J. STEVENS, Owego, N. Y.,	One	Share		100
C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, "	"	"		100
J. HENRY CLARK, "	"	"		100
E. B. WALDO, "	"	"		100
G. N. SPEARNS, "	"	"		100
JOHN M. KICE, "	"	"		100
MARSHALL BROS., Minneapolis, Minn.,	"	"		100
S. LYDARD, Long Lake, "	"	"		100
J. G. RICHARDSON, Lake City, "	Two	"		200
DR. D. K. BOUTELLE, "	One	"		100
H. E. GIBBS, Minneapolis, Minn.,	"	"		100
Mrs. E. CROSBY, Portage City, Wis.,	"	"		100
WM. H. ELLERY, Burlington, Iowa,	"	"		100
LYMAN T. OSBORN, Auburn, N. Y.,	"	"		100
P. C. TURNER, Albany, "	"	"		100
M. SCHLESINGER, "	"	"		100
JOSEPH KNIGHT, Troy, Ohio,	"	"		100
L. S. BRYANT, Dayton, "	"	"		100
L. F. GARDNER, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.,	"	"		100
J. C. CHATTEMENT, Rutherford Park, N. J.,	"	"		100
W. J. LEWIS, Illon, N. Y.,	"	"		100
HARVEY HAKER, "	"	"		100
TUDOR BROWN, Worcester, Mass.,	"	"		100
C. W. ESTERBROOK, "	"	"		100
E. B. LOMING, Boston, "	"	"		100
				$77,500

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION:
CONDITIONAL STOCK LIST.

We, the undersigned, subscribers to the capital stock of the Index Association, agree to double our previous subscriptions to said stock on the same terms as before, taking respectively the additional number of shares set opposite to our names in the list below:

PROVIDED, That the full sum of One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000) shall have been subscribed in good faith by the twenty-sixth day of October, 1872—that is, within one year from the date when THE INDEX passed into the hands of the Index Association.

ALEX. COCHRAN, Franklin, Pa.,	Five	Shares,	$500
CLAP, A. GURLEY, Pulaski, N. Y.,	"	"	200
MAX PRACH, Cincinnati, Ohio,	"	"	200
J. N. LYMAN, Columbus, "	One	"	100
WALTER F. AUSTIN, Pittsburgh, Pa.,	Two	"	200
JAS. R. STONE, Cincinnati, Ohio,	One	"	100
			$1,500

It is our privilege this week to give to the readers of THE INDEX a singularly fine and beautiful piece of spiritual analysis kindly sent by Professor Newman. Its delicate discrimination between the true and the false, the beneficial and the injurious, the lofty and the low, in the Christian "Vision of Heaven," makes it a model of religious criticism. The value of it will be very poorly appreciated by him who does not pause to admire the sympathetic way in which the critic enters into the interior spirit of the belief he is examining, with a most scrupulous desire to do it absolute justice. This capacity of passing outside the circle of his own present convictions, and taking an inside view of ideas quite opposed to them, makes Professor Newman, at least within the range of his past spiritual experience, the Taine of religious literature.

We also invite attention to the highly interesting "Camp-Meeting Notes" of Mr. S. H. Morse, late editor of the Boston Radical, who kindly promises occasional contributions to our columns.

A western radical writes to us that a tract was recently given to one of his children, which he read aloud at the dinner table. One sentence of this delectable document read as follows:—

"Consider for a moment how fearfully great is your danger! You and God are not friends. The wrath of God abideth on you. Your ways are a continual offence to him. They provoke him every day to cut you off. A sword hanging over your head by a single hair is but a faint emblem of the danger of your soul."

At this point a little six-year-old girl broke out with—"What does he know about God? He thinks he's smart!" Socrates would have delighted in a pupil who so instinctively manifested his own antipathy to "the conceit of knowledge without the reality."

A gentleman writes to know if his communications would be acceptable if sent oftener. We can only say that we are always glad to receive interesting articles provided they are short; but so long as we are unable for want of room to publish all we receive, it would be hardly courteous to solicit more.

The Index.

SEPTEMBER 14, 1872.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

N. B.—All letters, business or otherwise, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, Drawer 88, Toledo, Ohio."

THE GROWTH OF A SLANDER.

In THE INDEX for July 6th, we published the Constitution of the "First Free Religious Society of St. Louis," of which the following is the fourth article:—

"Any member of this Society shall not, as such, be held on any account responsible to the organization for either his belief, unbelief, or conduct; and it shall be the duty of the society to secure to each and every member, or person having the floor, a courteous, full and free presentation of his views upon any topic under consideration. But any member may be held to account for unparliamentary language or conduct had in its presence."

This article admits of some criticism from a purely literary point of view; but its substance is unexceptionable, if judged by the fundamental principles of Free Religion. The New York Liberal Christian (Unitarian) remarks as follows in its issue of August 3d:—

"THE INDEX publishes the constitution of a new Free Religious Society, and says in its editorial comments that 'these articles very faithfully embody the principles of the free religious movement.' We suppose this is true, especially in regard to the principal article, which declares that 'any member of this society shall not, as such, be held on any account responsible to the organization for either his belief, unbelief or conduct.'"

This certainly goes far enough to satisfy the most exacting of those who see in freedom from all bonds and obligations the sum of all possible good for man. This is the most distinct avowal we have seen (by anybody on this side of the water) of the purposes of the modern revolution, which has for its object the denial and renunciation of the responsibility of men to their fellows for their character and actions, and the destruction of all ties between human beings except those of supposed self-interest and the animal needs of the hour.

A nice state of things this. Our friends do not feel responsible to God, for this exceedingly free religion has not yet made up its mind whether there is a God. And now they are unwilling to be responsible to their own church for their conduct. What is there in an arrangement like this to which the word organization can be rightly applied?"

This genial, just, and tenderly sympathetic paragraph (of which the editor, Dr. Bellows, who is now in Europe, can hardly claim the credit) apparently suggested these further comments by the Morning Star, the organ of the Freewill Baptists published at Dover, N. H., in its issue of August 14th:—

"NE PLUS ULTRA LIBERALISM.—The Free Religionists keep moving. They call their steps progressive, and expect to go ahead still. They now cordially welcome to all the privileges of their Association openly avowed infidels even of the atheistic type. They tolerate everything but a positive Christian faith. With that they seem to have no patience. It is treated as though it were the unpardonable sin. The last reported step is that mentioned in a recent number of THE INDEX, which forbids a free religious society to call any of its members to account, or subject them to any discipline or reproof for anything held in belief or practised in life. It is a religion that takes no note of faith or conduct. That is certainly pretty 'free,' and one is a little puzzled to guess what further step is to be taken on that line. Possibly the movement will henceforth be in a circle."

The next paper to join the hue-and-cry seems to have been the Boston Journal, the following extract from which we find quoted in the Boston Investigator of August 28th:—

"A 'free religious' association in St. Louis has but one condition of membership—the rejection of the Bible and Christianity. Of its 'freedom' there should be, perhaps, no doubt; but there may be curiosity as to what its 'religion' consists in. There is a kindred association in Toledo which declares itself 'not responsible for the conduct of its members,' and so throws overboard morality as well as religion."

And now this latter paragraph, copied into the great New York dailies, is "going the rounds of the press," as doubtless many of our readers know. From our endorsement of the wise and liberal declaration of the St. Louis Society that it will not, as such, undertake to sit in judgment on the opinions or actions of its members, see what an unlooked-for brood of basilisks and cockatrices is hatched under the incubating hen of prejudiced incapacity!

"THROWING MORALITY OVERBOARD."

Free Religion now stands indicted for all these frightful crimes:—

1. It demands "freedom from all bonds and obligations."
2. It "denies and renounces all responsibility of men to their fellows for their character and actions."
3. It "destroys all ties between human beings except those of supposed self-interest and the animal needs of the hour."
4. It "takes no note of faith or conduct."
5. It "throws overboard morality as well as religion."

Poor Free Religion!

We do not expect the authors of the above preternaturally sagacious and characteristically Christian criticisms to pay heed to any explanations of the offensive provision. Justice is a vulgar, plebeian, and pagan virtue, quite unworthy of cultivation by such saintly champions of the Gospel. What they intended was, not at all to tell the exact truth about Free Religion, but merely to make a point against it; not at all to enlighten people as to its actual character, but merely to inspire a wholesome horror of it. We therefore advise them not to take the trouble of reading this article, but rather to busy themselves with some new and still more ingenious device against the good name of their neighbors. What we have to say on the subject is designed only for the simple-minded folk who really want to know the truth about Free Religion, and who may possibly be startled to hear that it "throws morality overboard." From such as these we ask attention to a few plain statements.

1. Moral law is a part of universal natural law, binding on all intelligent beings in virtue of their intelligence. It can no more be repealed, evaded, or suspended than the law of gravitation, but is absolute and grounded in the very nature of things.

2. For obedience to this law, men are responsible to themselves so far as they are themselves alone concerned; responsible to society so far as the rights of others are concerned; and responsible to the whole universe of Being, so far as its peace, harmony and moral order are concerned.

3. Men are responsible to society in two ways, the civil law taking cognizance of all palpable crimes, and public opinion taking cognizance of all offences which civil law is powerless to reach.

4. No one is naturally responsible for his general conduct to any of the various organizations which he voluntarily joins for specific purposes. To such organizations he is only responsible for his conduct as a member of the same. He binds himself to help carry out their various special objects, and to obey their various adopted rules; but further than this he is not naturally under their jurisdiction.

5. An organization has a perfect right to require certain beliefs or certain virtues of character as qualifications of membership, and it has an equal right to require other qualifications to the exclusion of these. Its action may be wise or foolish, liberal or the reverse; but in neither case does its action at all affect the natural responsibility of men to themselves, to society, or to the fundamental law of the universe.

6. Free Religious organizations prefer to leave all questions of belief or conduct to the individual himself, being as he is under this threefold responsibility. They propose certain practical objects, and all who are interested in these objects are free to join. Whoever wishes to search for truth by the method of free thought, to enjoy the delights of sympathy and friendship in this ennobling pursuit, and to do his part in the great work of fostering a sincerer, loftier, and more upward-looking spirit in mankind at large, will be inevitably attracted to Free Religious Fellowship sooner or later; and this natural attraction is at once the bond of union and the protection against intruders. No artificial safeguards are required in such associations, for they are based on the indestructible facts of human nature.

It is plain, therefore, to every one who wants to understand, that Free Religion recognizes all natural obligations as of inviolable sacredness, and is opposed only to the artificial obligations based on narrow and false ideas. Indeed, it is little else than the practical recognition of obligation,—obligation to obey the laws of Thought rather than the superstitions of Bibles and churches and creeds; obligation to obey the laws of natural morality more faithfully than is demanded by any gospel; obligation to carry out the ideal of a brotherhood which knows no limit of race, sex, or religion. Its aims are intellectual truthfulness, moral integrity, social purity and happiness and love, political equality and freedom, universal education into the necessary conditions of a civilization that shall be built on the eternal rock of Nature. If (as we believe) all this leads to belief in and worship of God, then no teachings are doing more for the conservation of this belief and worship than those of Free Religion; but if it leads to nobler convictions than belief in God, and to loftier sentiments than those of worship, surely there could be no harm in that! Free Religion trusts the truth with absolute serenity, and commits itself to the laws of Nature without a shadow of fear. What need has it, therefore, of the wretched little defences of creed and ecclesiastical discipline behind which the churches tremblingly crouch? Welcome to all who will come, foolish or wise, sinner or saint! The coming of the ignorant and the vicious into our associations cannot hurt us, and may benefit them: let them come! We aim only at the true, the right, the pure, the beautiful, the blessed; and thrice is he armed against the attack of evil influences who labors to overcome them with weapons such as these.

"Throws morality overboard!" Yes, we would throw it out of your little ship of Christianity as one that is merciful throws overboard the gasping and dying fish back into its native element—back into the broad and sunlit sea of universal Nature!

The Golden Age of August 31 makes this statement:—

"It was Gov. McClurg and not Gov. Brown who wanted to have the Constitution turned into a Creed. The Liberal candidate for the Vice-Presidency is not a sectarian and not a fool."

The Philadelphia Christian Statesman, which is the special organ of the Christian Amendment party, in its issue of June 15 publishes the following letter which it says was written by Hon. B. Gratz Brown to "the officers of the National Association" under date of November 19, 1864:—

"Let me say that I will gladly help on God's work in the purifying and exalting this nation, and inscribing His word as its supreme law, in any and all ways, and in any and all places. I believe, unless we become in very truth a Christian nation, all other nationality will be ephemeral and delusive. I believe, furthermore, that the world, and especially the Western world, is awakening from its age of unbelief or spiritual languor, and that we are coming upon periods of active faith, when men will again seize upon and live or die by religious conviction as in days of old. Let us then, by all means, help forward that expression which shall inscribe as the banner of the people, 'The Banner of the Lord.'"

"Yours truly,
"B. GRATZ BROWN."

It appears from one of the "Communications" in this week's INDEX that Gov. Brown no longer adheres to the principles of this letter, having subsequently changed his mind. But the comments of the Golden Age are rather severe, when read in the light of the above effusion. Perhaps to favor the Christian Amendment movement is indeed to be "a sectarian and a fool;" but it is evident that Mr. Brown's "folly" and "active faith" have both been put to sleep, and that he no longer proposes "to live or die by religious conviction." We should have liked him quite as well if he had stood fearlessly by his "Banner of the Lord."

Victor Hugo says that "the dog carries his smile in his tail." The inference is that the dog is the greatest wag in the animal kingdom.

F. R. A. REPORT.

The pamphlet Report of the Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association for the present year is now ready for distribution.

It contains the report of the Executive Committee; Essays, by John W. Chadwick on "Liberty and the Church in America," by Chas. D. B. Mills on the question—"Does Religion represent a Permanent Sentiment of the Human Mind or is it a Perishable Superstition?" and by O. B. Frothingham on "The Religion of Humanity;" and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucretia Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Seaver, Alexander Loomis, and others.

Price of the Pamphlet Thirty-five cents. For this sum it will be sent by mail, post-paid, on addressing the undersigned at New Bedford, Mass.

Members of the Association who have paid the annual fee, and those who will now make themselves members by the payment of One Dollar, will receive the Report without additional cost.

WM. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

CHARITY AS A BOND OF PEACE.

It must have been an impressive scene in London when, Archbishop Manning presiding, Dr. H. W. Bellows delivered an address on John Howard before the Prison Association; and the interest must have deepened when, as the papers report, the representative of Romanism in England thanked the representative of American Unitarianism for his "able and eloquent address." The archbishop, if a letter that has been going the rounds of the press be a sincere account of the state of his mind on the subject, is heartily interested in the cause of prison reform which all liberals have much at heart; and the clasping of hands by these two men of such opposite theological views and such hostile church connections looks at first like a symbol of coming union on grounds of humanity, the sinking of the feuds of ages in brotherly sympathy, the oblivion of intellectual hostilities in the embrace of brotherly love. There are those who hail the omen as a promise that a new epoch of peace is to succeed the old epochs of war, a pledge that the Christianity of the spirit is to expel the Christianity of creed and form, a visible sign of the second coming of Jesus. Is it wise to indulge the hope? Just now people profess to look for sudden conversions,—the conversion of the German Emperor to liberal principles, of the Democratic party to republican ideas; why not anticipate the conversion of an archbishop to charity, of a sectarian to humanity, of a "Christian" to the Sermon on the Mount?

On general principles, they who suspect the genuineness of the first class of transformations may be permitted to doubt the genuineness of the others. But there may be special reasons for distrusting the value of the recent sign. Without questioning needlessly the sincerity of Archbishop Manning's private convictions, it should not be forgotten that Romanism is more than anything else diplomatic. The Church of Rome meditates the conquest of England. Archbishop Manning is her chief officer there, by many persons regarded as a possible candidate for the Papal chair, in case it ever becomes more vacant than it is; he must therefore, like a skilful general, consult the prejudices and accommodate himself to the genius of the people he schemes among. This genius is practical. The earnestness of the English is bent on social reform. Such genuine religion as is in them shows itself in works of philanthropy. Its saints are humanitarians like Maurice. The Dissenters are interested in the problems of pauperism, intemperance, vice, crime, and the perishing and the dangerous classes. The broad church is the useful, sympathetic, beneficent church. Romanism cannot neglect these facts and hope to succeed,—and our knowledge of her artfulness prepares us for the spectacle of Catholic prelates presiding at philanthropic meetings and controlling philanthropic associations.

The sincerity of the demonstration may be tested by the results achieved where Romanism has everything its own way—in Rome, for instance. There the Pope is chief magistrate, and all the subordinate officers regard him as the vicar of Christ; and there the condition of the prisoners is said to be a disgrace to civilization, worse than any state in Christendom can show.

But were it otherwise, were it precisely the opposite, the value of the London symbol, and of the prophecy suggested by it that charity is to be the bond of peace, would not be greatly enhanced. We have no faith in work as the solvent of theological discords. The efficacy of charitable work of whatever kind, to say nothing of its moral significance, depends on the spirit in which it is undertaken, and that depends on the ideas that possess the workers. Behind philanthropy is philosophy, animating, guiding, shaping. They who would work to purpose in company must agree in regard to the precise scope of the work to be done, the ultimate end to be reached, the rationale or system of means to be employed, the comparative merits of different appliances and rules. The man whose chief interest is in the saving of souls cannot work well with the man whose chief interest is in the saving of bodies; the man who aims at bringing people into his church cannot co-operate with the man who aims at improving their physical and social condition; the man who uses philanthropy as a means cannot labor cordially with the man who regards it as an end. They do not contemplate the same objects; of course they will not effect the same things. Head, heart, and hands must work together.

Hence we hope nothing from the attempts to obtain through charity a condition of religious peace. No combination is possible of elements that are so uncongenial. Before there can be union on the principles of humanity, the principles of humanity must be understood and respected; and in order that they may be understood and respected, the theological method must be abandoned and the sectarian policy wholly discarded. Social reforms have never been well managed by churchmen or sectaries of any name, even when no division of religious opinion has disturbed the harmony of purpose or action; they certainly will be badly managed when serious division exists. We are beginning to learn that social reforms are best left to the methods of social science, in which thus far the ecclesiastical and dogmatic mind is not proficient. O. B. F.

SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY.

One of the objects of the Free Religious Association, as declared in its constitution, is "to encourage the scientific study of theology." The use of this phrase has been not a little misunderstood. At the origin of the Association the venerable Lucretia Mott thought that it savored of "Divinity Schools" and of that systematic and ecclesiastical preparation for the ministerial office in which she, as a member of the Society of Friends, did not believe. She did not urge her objection except so far as to say, when nominated as one of the Vice-Presidents, that owing to her views on that point she could not consistently accept the position. She has now evidently come to see that the phrase was not used in the sense in which her previous views led her to interpret it, since this year she allowed her name to go upon the list of officers, and finds, as she says, every year her faith and interest in the Association increasing.

Others felt that the phrase had too much reminiscence of the old metaphysical, mystical, and dogmatic systems of faith. They thought that they detected in it a bias towards unfruitful speculation, rather than an interest in the practical questions that concern human welfare, and were somewhat apprehensive lest the new organization would only promote another form of wrangling about matters which few can understand, but in which men have been apt to be arrogant in proportion to their ignorance. One of the most devoted members of the Association, a speaker at the last annual meeting, said to me that he had this feeling when he first saw the constitution, and that it only passed away when he read the addresses and writings of those who were the prominent movers in the organization and understood from these what their aims must be; and he had little doubt that many other persons of antecedents similar to his—persons longing for a practical religion of humanity as opposed to the metaphysical, theological speculations of the past—still interpreted this phrase to the prejudice of the Association, just as he might have done if his first thought had not been corrected by further inquiry.

Those who inserted this phrase in the constitution did not, it is certain, anticipate this class of objections. They did expect the criticism of those religionists who do not believe that the scientific method can be applied to the study of religion, of those who think that reason and faith are antagonistic; but they felt so sure that they were not themselves meditating a revival of dogmatic theological speculation, or aiming at establishing any realm of faith beyond the recognition of reason, that it did not occur to them that their phraseology on this point might be misunderstood by some of those who are working for the same result with themselves, namely, the application of free intelligence to all problems of thought and life. Had this occurred to them, they might perhaps have chosen some other form of words for expressing their idea.

Still, even their phraseology seems likely in time to be vindicated. True, the phrase "scientific theology," or "scientific study of theology," is, strictly speaking, somewhat tautological. The word theology properly implies science. But when it is considered how opposed to all real science the ordinary assumptions and methods of all theological systems have been, it seems not only excusable but necessary to append the word scientific to indicate the reform that is needed in this department of human thought and study. And this, evidently, is what the originators of the constitution of the Free Religious Association meant in their use of the phrase in question. They meant to indicate that the principles and method of science should be applied to all problems of religion. They meant to indicate the kind of study of the history of religion that such scholars as Max Müller and Renan and Tylor are now making. They meant that reason must be free to observe and classify all facts, material and mental, pertaining to the religious development of all races of mankind, and must not be retained at the outset, as has been usually the case among theologians, in the partisan interest of some special religious system.

And if it be objected that belief in the supernatural has played such a prominent part in the theology of the past as to make the chief interest of the subject, and that as this belief passes away the study of theology sinks in importance, the reply is that the proper realm of theology is not limited by a strictly etymological definition of the word. Under this term, though in different ways, man has attempted to express his notion of his own relation to the primary and central cause, law, or vital power of the universe; and whatever may be the philosophy that is held concerning this relation, it comes properly within the limits of theological study. If in the past, relying upon imagination more than upon facts, this philosophy has resorted to the hypothesis of supernatural divinities, or of one almighty being in human form as the maker of the world in a definite period of time—an hypothesis which science does not sustain—it does not follow that there can be no philosophy of the relation between the finite consciousness of man and the Universal Life, and no form of theology which reason can accept. Religion as a prominent part of the history of mankind must at least always be of interest to the student of human nature, even if religion were now to cease. But just as natural science tells us that no force in the physical world is ever lost, but, if it seems to vanish, really reappears in some other form, so we may be reasonably sure that, even if all the existing systems of theology and religion were now to pass away, the elements of emotion and thought which produced them are not to be lost, but will be conserved in some other form; and it is not the specific beliefs and institutions of this or that religion, but these mental and moral elements from which they came, that make the substance of theological study.

In this sense theology certainly is not a vanishing but an advancing science; and every physical or mental science is a part of it. That Law, or Life, or Force, which underlies, penetrates, and unites the whole,—this is the central subject of theology; and the theologian of the future, therefore, must not only know the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures but the Bibles of all races, and understand not only ecclesiastical history and doctrines but be versed in natural science and the whole history of man.

W. J. P.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

And my last field was along the Lake Shore Railroad in Ohio, including Painesville, Chardon and Clyde. But politics have the floor. This is their hour and the power of darkness. The party leaders prey upon the personal reputation of each other with the rapacity of wolves. So little principle, so much of personality never before entered into a presidential canvass. The people, the non-officeholders and non-aspirants to office, it seems to me, never had so little at stake in a federal election. I positively cannot see what particular difference it can make to them which party wins in the fray. If one party tells the truth, President Grant is the meanest man republican institutions ever bore. The other party would have us believe that the weakness and wickedness of Horace Greeley begin where Grant's leave off, and stretch away whole continents beyond. Now, do the parties believe what they say themselves, or expect to be believed? But what is the effect of such husbandry on the character and conscience of the people—on the mind and heart of young men—or of any men not debased already? The depravity of Senator Sumner would seem to eclipse both presidential candidates.

What fearful compliment the party drill-sargeants pay to the intelligence of the people, by their pictorial, poetical, and pen and speech-making appeals! It is this feature of the election which most concerns me. It teaches me too, by its zeal and fervor, my only lesson. So far, then, I am interested.

For I also would be in earnest in my work. The Abolitionists were the most illustrious example of well-tempered zeal in a grand and holy enterprise, known to modern times. None ever were more terribly in earnest; none surely ever contended against greater odds. Now almost everybody wishes to be known as of, or among, the earliest Abolitionists. I do not know how many have told me they cast the first abolition vote ever thrown in their town—voting all alone, time after time. And I have even forgotten how many have boasted to me that they raised or commanded the first colored company or regiment that went to the field in the war of Rebellion.

And just as I labored in the anti-slavery movement in its days of darkness, long before it included armies, or contemplated a political party, even, among its instrumentalities, so had I in the service of the Congregational church; honestly assenting to, if not believing, its creed, covenant and catechisms. Both were to me downright earnest, religious work. Nothing could ever be more so.

In all these is my example for the present hour and its claims. My own in the church and pulpit, and subsequently as an Abolitionist; the first anti-slavery voters; the soldiers of the army of the Rebellion, both sides, indeed, and now, the political parties, the leaders and followers, all by their earnestness and fervor would rebuke me to shame, did I not feel a constant consciousness that in so far I endeavor to imitate such example.

And then, too, the untiring, undaunted zeal of the church and ministry at the present hour. Every old instrumentality is constantly at work—new measures and new machinery are super-added every year. Not more regular are the harvests of autumn from the field than are the revival reapings and gatherings into the garner of the church. And, like the natural harvests, some years richer than others; richer in some sections of the country than others. But the churches do observe the times and seasons, and harvest always according to their husbandry.

In such a presence as all this, may not the Free Religionists, the Index Association, the Spiritualists, and the Liberals and Progressives of every school invite themselves to a little self-inspection as to their own earnestness and devotion to the sublime movement they have in hand? Their mission, rightly considered, transcends all others in importance, that now are or ever have been.

Only to emancipate our four million slaves exhausted one whole generation of Garrisons and Phillipses, Theodore Parkers, John G. Whittiers, Lucretia Motte, and Abby Kelly Fosters, and many more, the noblest, bravest, and greatest men and women the world has ever produced. And then came the war and its baptism of blood and fire; a half million of men slain; the young and strong, the beautiful and heroic; an idolized President crowning the holocaust, bending mourning millions in grief unutterable over his bier! But the purchase, even at such price, was not too dear.

And yet all that was but prelude to the work now in hand. Our mission contemplates the redemption of mankind. Its importance and sublimity are not yet half revealed to ourselves. It is yet to have its conflicts, its heroes, its martyrs. The rich and the poor will yet lay themselves and their treasure on its altars. Its warfare will yet be the wonder of the world. Its history will be volumes of its own, read with surprise and delight in millennial ages. And it will be the pride and joy of many yet unborn to know that even their remote progenitors bore humble part in the great accomplishment.

I wish we could any of us better grasp the grand idea. THE INDEX should have a capital of a million instead of a hundred thousand dollars. And there should be other similar establishments, east and west, with missionaries, both men and women, able, earnest, devoted, and well sustained, too, in every State. The Abolitionists early learned the way. The churches and pulpits, Catholic and Protestant, have long known it, and are setting us only too good an example at the present hour.

There are millions of souls to-day hungering and thirsting for the truths we tell. There are millions of dollars ready to be consecrated to the cause we plead, so soon as we can make our voices heard and our wants known, and can give reasonable assurance, as did the Abolitionists, that we are in dead earnest. It was Garrison who said:—"I will not equivocate; I will never retreat; I will not budge a single inch—AND I WILL BE HEARD!"

And Garrison was heard! From that time he was never without friends, sympathy, or support. His followers were never numerically a host, and many even of the best were poor and obscure. But by their unshaken faith, their untiring persistency and devotion, and the justice of their cause, they were invincible from the hour they unfurled their banners. History affords us no more illustrious example.

P. P.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to errors.
N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

"A DISGRACE TO THIS TOWN—THE INFIDELS."

Protected by a government which is the peculiar exponent of freedom of thought and action, living under the benign influences of the constitution of the State of Illinois, which guarantees liberty of conscience to all its citizens, in the midst of an enlightened community, the Fairbury Journal of August 3d, 1872, contains the above line in its local columns.

Fairbury has a band of men and women who do not believe in the doctrines of the Christian religion, and who, in their love for what they believe to be the truth, so express themselves and stand fairly before the world. These people the editor of the Journal seeks to bring into "disgrace," not because they are ignorant, immoral, or disturbers of the peace, but because they are "infidels." He does not name particular individuals and condemn them on account of ill conduct; he condemns "the infidels."

Protestants do not yet, and cannot soon, forget the time when thousands of them were called on to lay down their lives a willing sacrifice on the altar of a religion which they counted infinitely dearer and more valuable to them than their offering, and for which they would bear disgrace and scorn and death. They point with pride to the fact that it was a band of persecuted Puritans who became pilgrims, and planted upon Plymouth Rock the principle of religious freedom which we proudly adopt to-day, and which has been carefully preserved in our constitution. And yet, opposed though it is to the foundation of free government, opposed to the spirit and genius of true Protestantism, opposed to all principles of reason and right, very many, in their zeal for what they suppose to be the interests of true religion, are ready to brand with disgrace all who differ from them. It is wrong, unwise, despicable. It is the result of a feeling which has done more than any other to retard the progress of truth in science, religion and government; and the best minds reject it as unworthy a moment's indulgence.

History repeats itself. Men must be reminded again and again of Jesus, and Stephen, and Galileo, and the Scottish Presbyterians, and hosts of others. Roger Williams did more than any other man in founding and fostering the colony of Rhode Island; and he was banished from Massachusetts on account of a religious belief which is now with multitudes the received truth. Thomas Paine wrote his "Common Sense" before the American Revolution, and struck the first blow for a republic. He wrote "The Rights of Man," a work which has done invaluable good in the cause of human liberty; and for these he was held a philanthropist. He wrote the "Age of Reason," and instantly his former services were forgotten and himself socially and religiously ostracised; but his "reason" lives to-day, firmly believed in by thousands of men and women who search for truth keenly and anxiously.

Men should learn that thought is free and that convictions are sacred; that, while they may condemn the actions of men, while they may refuse to adopt their doctrines, while they may even decri their opinions as dangerous, yet men must not judge men.

G. A.

BLOOMINGTON, Ill., Aug. 4, 1872.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE CAMPAIGN.

ELMWOOD, Ill., Aug. 19, 1872.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—On the 27th of June last, I addressed a letter to each of the Presidential and Vice-Presidential candidates now before the people, to this effect:—

"The undersigned, believing that a concerted and powerful effort will soon be made to secure a Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, desire respectfully to inquire whether such a movement would meet with your approval?"

This letter was signed by a few prominent citizens, without regard to party or sect. Mr. Greeley (through John Cochrane) replies that he is opposed to the incorporation of any theological amendments in the Constitution, though he refers all things, immediate or remote, to the power of God.

Mr. Gratz Brown is brief and emphatic in opposition to any amendment of the kind.

President Grant and Mr. Wilson do not reply. I would like to say a word on political matters, but, knowing your limited space, I forbear. The above, however, is a straw worth noting.

Yours truly,
E. R. BROWN.

[This aspect of the present political campaign comes strictly within the scope of THE INDEX, and we are glad to publish the above letter. If we thought that the Christian Amendment project really entered into the canvass, we should regard it as the paramount issue; but we do not. That battle must be fought out in the popular, not the presidential, mind. When its hour arrives, it will swallow up all other questions. The way to forestall the perils of religious retrogression and reviving bigotry is rather to spend our energies in the work of fostering the spirit of intellectual liberty among the people, than to busy ourselves with candidates for office. Free the people from superstition, and presidents will have no power to re-enslave them. Not from the White House or the Capitol, but from the great and powerful Christian Church, will emanate the attempt to establish Christianity as the national religion. Still, it is wise to be alert in all directions. As a matter of fact, neither Greeley and Brown nor Grant and Wilson are very likely to lend themselves to the Christianizers' plans at present, though we would not trust the defence of perfect liberty of thought to any one of the four. Far more do we rely on that in-born love of freedom which has become a fixed element of the American character, and which only needs to be enlightened and educated. Will our correspondent please send us for publication a copy of Gratz Brown's statement on this subject?—ED.]

WHAT IS IT TO BE A CHRISTIAN?

Mr. E. I. Crane thinks that perhaps Mr. Howard can relieve him from his embarrassment in regard to what it is to be, and how one is to become, a Christian. Most certainly. With very great pleasure will I render this service. I would like to have an opportunity to preach Christ to all the rest of the readers of THE INDEX. I will now straightway address myself to this pleasing task. Here is the doctrine:—

"Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

"Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled."

"Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy."

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

"What doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly, love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?"

"Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this: to visit the widow and the fatherless in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world."

Does Mr. Crane take any exception to the doctrine? If this, thus far, be not the "whole counsel," still perhaps it will do for an introductory lesson. After Mr. Crane shall have faithfully practised and effectually mastered this, I shall then be pleased to give him another—possibly read him the thirteenth chapter of Corinthians; for it should be remembered that in religion, as in anything else, it is only those who do the will that have the promise of knowing the doctrine. To all others it is "dry"—"a root out of dry ground." To only such as those whose supreme purpose is to be pure, holy,—to such as are penetrated with a sense of their low moral plane, and of the need of help to rise to their ideal of moral attainment and achievement, does the gospel of Christ mean anything. To all others, I suppose, it is as uninviting as the circular about the turbine-wheel to Mr. Abbot or to myself. What Mr. Crane needs is not simply to have the eye of his reason, but the eye of his conscience, the eye of faith, opened. I think I detect in his communication a trifling spirit. God never honors that. He honors earnestness, out-and-out honesty, and a manly faith. No one should approach or assume to discuss religious subjects with an air or in the spirit of levity. "No room for mirth or trifling here!" Man's relations to time, to eternity, and to God, are of a nature too solemn to be considered other than with the most solemn earnestness. In this regard, indeed, the correspondents of THE INDEX would do well to imitate the example of its worthy editor, and, indeed, for that matter, of its able and conscientious editorial fellow-laborers.

MILFORD, MASS.

R. H. HOWARD.

[Is this all? Mr. Crane wanted light on certain doctrines declared to be essential. Mr. Howard gives him no answer at all, and we are left as much in the dark as ever.—ED.]

A PULPIT HERO.

ZIONSVILLE, Ind., Aug. 19, 1872.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—I am a reader of your sterling little sheet, and prize it very highly for the bold utterances of its writers in the cause of truth and humanity. I wish there were ten thousand such papers scattered from one end of the continent to the other; for if such were the case, we should see the religious bigot, instead of hugging the dogmas and superstitions of bygone centuries, standing out in the full light of the noonday sun, and by the help of its life-giving beams his soul would grow and expand until there would be no place for prescription, narrow-mindedness, and intolerance.

There are a few in this place who are readers of THE INDEX. Some of them are members of the Methodist Episcopal church, notwithstanding the minister, Rev. Mr. Colvin, carried a copy of THE INDEX into the pulpit with him, and, holding it up with the most scornful contempt, ridiculed it with the remark that it was a little bit of a paper at a cost of two dollars per year, while the church organs were four times as large at a less price. Had he asked me the reason of the difference in price, I should have told him that the full, plump grain of wheat was worth ten times what the chaff would bring in a market where bread was wanted. He proceeded to remark that there was no sense, no science, nor anything else about the paper, and no man of sense would read such a sheet. He then challenged the unbelievers to discuss the question of the truthfulness of the Holy Bible as the word of God. Yet with all his brag, when a certain man by the name of Davis (whose health is such that he cannot take part in a public discussion) happens to meet this champion in a store or elsewhere, he retreats on double-quick.

Yours,

A LOVER OF TRUTH.

WAKED UP.

BRONSON, Mich., Aug. 29, 1872.

F. E. ABBOT:

My Dear Sir,—A short time since Mrs. Dr. —, having occasion to use some wrapping paper, applied THE INDEX to that purpose, enveloping some article of clothing for a lady friend in a copy of it, also slipping in a copy of the "Impeachment of Christianity," at the inquiry of her friend as to whether the paper was interesting reading.

The package was taken to the lady's sister, who with her husband recently united with the Baptist church. On being opened, the appalling character of the heretical sheet was discovered. Whether the lady, in Catholic fashion, dropped it at the feet of her father confessor, is not known; but he soon learned of the terrible condition affairs were assuming, and made haste to warn his flock of the fact. On a recent Sunday he preached from one of the texts in the "Impeachment," stigmatizing THE INDEX as a "Spiritualist, free-love sheet, a disgrace to civilization and the city of Toledo, of which he had formerly entertained a favorable opinion." Mrs. Abbot came in for a goodly share of sympathy for the trials she is necessitated to endure as a result of living in the society of such a monster of infidelity and loose social ideas as you were pictured to be.

I did not hear the sermons, but from advices wrote the following account to the Coldwater Republican, which appeared under the head of "Bronson Items." I can get no copy of the paper to send you, and had supposed that Dr. — had written you concerning the matter:—

Rev. E. A. Gay, the Henry Ward Beecher of Bronson, preached a sensational sermon on a recent Sabbath, taking for the subjects of his discourse the Rev. Francis E. Abbot, the Free Religious minister of Toledo, Ohio, and the journal over which he editorially presides, THE INDEX. For the benefit of all interested, we would state that the periodical alluded to is not a "spiritualist, free-love" sheet; its editor neither wears horn nor boasts on the bodies and souls of his victims; nor are its supporters marplots, desperadoes, or villains. Although the same subject was continued on a succeeding Sunday, Revs. T. T. George and J. R. Bonney also taking part in the discussion with more moderation and ability, yet we do not apprehend that by this attack the erudite little Index has been doomed to oblivion, or its able, talented, and gentlemanly editor been annihilated.

I expected a reply, but not a word yet.

Yours, etc.,

J. F. RUGGLES.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE.

Christianity is the science of death. It teaches us how to die, to prepare for a future state. Such a science is not necessary. We need to know how to live, not how to die; how to make the most of our earthly lot, to realize its mighty possibilities, whether there is a life to come or not. We must learn that to do right is infinitely sublime, whether we have a chance to do it for a longer or shorter time. Our great need is, not to know that we are immortal, but to know our present duties, to know how to make men happy here, strong in body, clear in vision, skilful in work, bold in duty. We want to make men good citizens and neighbors, earnest thinkers and wise doers, not simply saints who are prepared, perhaps, to die with écclat, but, alas! are not prepared to live in a noble fashion. Too much time has been spent in trying to get passports to heaven, and not enough to keep men from lying, cheating and debauchery. We have too many ecstasies, and not enough execution. Our vision is wide and vague, not keen and close. Let the eternities take care of themselves; we must study the signs of the times; we must look at the morning and evening skies over us, not peer into graves. Eschatology is a thing of the past, like astrology and alchemy. It has been proved that the philosopher's stone lies in the strong muscle and keen brain, and that the only "eternal life" we know lies in the faithful performance of every-day duties. We can do immortal things whether we are immortal or not; we can put some beautiful influence in motion that will never die, though we ourselves may perish tomorrow; we must learn to grasp the splendid possibilities of the present; we must see how wonderful life is, not in its length, but in its height and depth and breadth, in its largeness, not of space and time, but of power and beauty; we must stick to our earthly lot with our whole soul, and make the most of it in obedience to a wise science, before we can come into the full stature of men. We are not put here to prepare for a life to come, but to unfold the infinite capacities that lie round about us now, and to realize the immeasurable glory that every moment bears to the free, heroic mind.

NORTH PLATTE, NEB.

S. P. PUTNAM.

"A NEW RELIGION."

MR. ABBOT:

I enclose you an extract from Carlyle's "Past and Present," for which I trust you will be able to find space. In this age of "spiritual paralysis," it is refreshing to turn over the leaves of this true prophet, and have recalled to mind the grand fact, now so often ignored, that God does veritably rule, and that the soul of man is not a mere phantasm.

We also have our "New Religion;" a Religion-Made-Easy, with improved spiritual mechanism, whereby spiritual truth may be obtained "on reasonable terms." "A New Dispensation," we are told, is being ushered in by aerial "Congresses," and already boasts of its Eleven Millions. All things again are to become new. In lieu of God, we are to have a Principle; faith in Him is a delusion and sham, now wisely outgrown, and to be replaced by confidence in self. Life is no longer a warfare, but the flowery entrance to a grand Apotheosis of Self!

In view of these facts, the quotation annexed may be well made at the present time, and will bear pondering on.

DYER D. LUM.

MANCHESTER, N. H.

"Thou hast not a New Religion; nor art thou likely to get any. Thou hast already more 'religion' than thou makest use of. This day thou knowest ten commanded duties, aecst in thy mind ten things which should be done, for one that thou doest! Do one of them; this of itself will show thee ten others which can and shall be done. But my future fate? Yes, thy future fate, indeed! Thy future fate, while thou makest of the chief question, seems to me—extremely questionable! I do not think it can be good. Norée Odin, immemorial centuries ago, did not he, though a poor Heathen, in the dawn of Time, teach us that for the Dastard there was and could be no good fate; no harbor anywhere save down with Hela, in the pool of Night? Dastards, Esauos, are they that lost for F-essure, that tremble at pain. For this world and for the next Dastards are a class of creatures made to be 'arrested'; they are good for nothing else, can look for nothing else. A greater than Odin has been here. A greater than Odin has taught us—not a greater Dastardism, I hope! My brother, thou must pray for a soul; struggle as with life and death energy to get back thy soul! Know that 'religion' is no Morrison's Pill from without, but a re-awakening of thy own Self from within; and, above all, leave me alone of thy 'religions' and 'new religions' here and elsewhere! I am weary of this sick croaking for a Morrison's Pill religion; for any and for every such. I want none such; and discern all such to be impossible."

PREJUDICES.

A person disturbing the usual position of the eye may see what is termed "double;" i. e., behold two objects where in reality there is but one. He is fully aware of the illusion, but by no means can banish the optical illusion by any power of will.

So with prejudice. Many recognize the falseness of their views in numerous departments of life, but on no account can they correct the evident errors; for life-long custom eats out all sense of the true, and the judgment is weakened by too long a subservience to the false.

MUSICIAN.

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, on REPRESENTATIVE PAR-TAKES FROM THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—Ten Cents (New Edition).

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents concepts of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no able, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution?" Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR
B. BRAIDFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies
One Dollar.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—"The Present Heaven," by O. B. FROTHING-HAM, is a singularly felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents;
Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 9.—"The Christian Amendment," by F. E. ABBOT, contains in full the Call for the Cincinnati Convention of the "National Reform Association," which proposes to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution,—the list of its most prominent supporters,—and a full exposure of the dangerous and revolutionary character of the movement. PRICE—Single copies, Five Cents;
Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

Also, *The Bible Argument Against Woman
Suffrage*, a pungent pamphlet by A. J. GROVER, is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

Address, THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Back Numbers of the Index!

FOR 1870 AND 1871.

IT is no longer possible to furnish a complete file of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound.
But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address at

Twenty-five Cents a Dozen!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

Address THE INDEX,
Toledo, Ohio.

F. J. SCOTT, J. H. STOPPLET,
ARCHITECTS,
13 MADISON STREET (Near Boody House), TOLEDO,
(180-181)

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy,
PUBLISHED QUARTERLY IN ST. LOUIS, MO.

It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of Speculative Philosophy in all its departments.

Terms of Subscription.

Two dollars per volume; single number, 50 cents.
Vols. I. and II., bound in one volume in muslin, will be sent post-paid by mail for $5.00.
Vol. III., and Vol. IV., and Vol. V. in muslin, $3.00 each.

All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor,

WM. T. HARRIS,

110-116eow. Box 3238, St. Louis, Mo.

Free Thought Literature.

Force and Matter," by Dr. Buchner..... $3.00 Elsewhere; or Over the Range." The great English free thought satire..... 2.50
The Trial of Theism..... 1.00
Secular Almanac for 1878..... .35

J. F. RUGGLES,

[141-145eow] Bronson, Mich.

ENGLISH AND FRENCH FAMILY AND DAY SCHOOL.
87 W. Seventh Street, Cincinnati.

MISS C. E. NOURSE will re-open her School for Young Ladies and Children, Monday, Sept. 22. Her address during the summer will be No. 23 Dene St., Boston, and from Sept. 1 as above. [138-145.]

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

Capital, $100,000.

Shares, $100.

OFFICERS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, President.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Vice President.
P. H. BATESON, Secretary.
A. E. MACOMBER, Treasurer.

DIRECTORS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
ASA K. BUTTS, New York, N. Y.
RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Toledo, O.
A. E. MACOMBER, " " "
CALVIN CONE, " " "
EDWARD BENSELL, " " "
P. H. BATESON, " " "

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo,	O.,	Twenty Shares,	$3,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	"	"	Fifteen	1,500
C. CONE,	"	"	"	1,500
EDWARD BENSELL,	"	"	Forty	4,000
P. H. BATESON,	"	"	Ten	1,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	"	"	"	1,000
GUIDO MARX,	"	"	"	1,000
P. H. BATESON,	"	"	"	1,000
E. P. BARRETT,	"	"	Three	300
H. E. HOWE,	"	"	"	300
W. C. FINE,	"	"	"	300
J. M. RITCHIE,	"	"	"	300
V. KERN,	"	"	"	300
ALLANSON WOOD,	"	"	"	300
WILLIAM KRAUS,	"	"	Five	500
J. G. HOLEWANTH,	"	"	One	100
JOS. E. MARX,	"	"	"	100
C. AGGARHARD,	New York,	N. Y.,	Thirty	3,000
ASA K. BUTTS,	Newport,	R. I.,	Two	200
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Franklin,	Pa.,	Two	200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Cincinnati,	O.,	Two	200
Geo. HOADLY,	Danville,	"	One	100
MRS. A. HALL,	Northampton,	Mass.,	"	100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Tonica,	Ill.,	"	100
J. BODROBER,	Monroeville,	O.,	"	100
HENRY MILLER,	Sacramento,	Cal.,	Five	500
L. R. SUNDHILLAND,	Quincy,	Mass.,	One	100
J. L. WHITTING,	Boston,	"	"	100
LOUIS BRISTOL,	Croydon,	N. H.,	"	100
J. E. SUTTON,	Olathe,	Kan.,	"	100
SAM T. DUNKER,	"	"	"	100
J. M. HADLEY,	"	"	"	100
S. L. HILL,	Florence,	Mass.,	Two	200
W. H. STENCER,	Haverhill,	"	"	200
JOS. F. BARRETT,	Boston,	"	"	200
E. W. WHEAT,	La Grange,	Ind.,	"	200
FRANK PRATHER,	Wellsville,	Mass.,	Five	500
E. P. DIMMORE,	New York,	N. Y.,	One	100
J. T. DIMMORE,	Middlefield,	Cl.,	Fourteen	1,400
W. J. POTTER,	New Bedford,	Mass.,	Three	300
G. C. GLATTE,	Kendallville,	Ind.,	"	300
W. C. GANNETT,	Boston,	Mass.,	"	300
MRS. M. C. PARKINS,	"	"	One	100
MRS. S. EMERSON,	Dover,	N. H.,	"	100
MRS. E. EMERSON,	"	"	"	100
W. E. DOWNING,	Birmingham,	Ala.,	"	100
B. B. SMITH,	Leansing,	Mich.,	"	100
R. B. SMITH,	Warren,	Pa.,	"	100
W. C. RUSSEL,	Ithaca,	N. Y.,	"	100
WM. CLARKE,	Toledo,	O.,	Three	300
C. L. SMITH,	"	"	One	100
J. N. LETHAM,	Cincinnati,	"	Twenty	2,000
L. C. FRISCH,	Monroe Centre,	"	One	100
A. POLSON,	Boston,	Mass.,	Three	300
L. O. BARR,	Colebrook,	Conn.,	One	100
S. E. SEWALL,	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	500
ELIZABETH WRIGHT,	"	"	"	500
E. B. WALD,	Detroit,	Mich.,	Twenty	2,000
A. D. WILT,	Dayton,	Ohio,	One	100
E. S. BOSTON,	Kaukaun,	N. Y.,	"	100
WM. JONES,	Peekskill,	N. Y.,	"	100
S. H. DAKIN,	Oskaloosa,	Iowa,	"	100
J. H. YORK,	Dover,	N. H.,	"	100
JOS. HATZ,	"	"	"	100
G. P. FOLSON,	"	"	"	100
"A. FRIEND,"	"	"	"	100
MRS. H. E. PERKINS,	Boston,	Mass.,	Two	200
O. O. O'NEILL,	"	"	One	100
WILLIAM GREEN,	Orange,	N. J.,	"	100
"A. FRIEND,"	Lowell,	Mass.,	"	100
D. B. STEINMAN,	Brattleboro,	Vt.,	"	100
MRS. F. W. CHRISTIAN,	New York, N. Y.,	"	"	100
C. W. FABIOT,	Kelly's Island, O.,	"	Two	200
EDW. M. DAVIS,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	"	One	100
MRS. LUCRETIA MOTT,	"	"	"	100
MISS M. A. WRIGHT,	Jersey City, N. J.,	"	"	100
A. S. BROWN,	Worcester,	Mass.,	"	100
EDWIN BROWN,	"	"	"	100
R. P. HOLLOWELL,	Boston,	"	Five	500
BENJ. RODMAN,	New Bedford,	"	Three	300
H. B. CLARKE,	"	"	"	300
FRANK J. SCOTT,	Toledo,	O.,	Six	600
M. L. HOLDSBROOK,	Boulton,	Me.,	One	100
W. H. BOUGHTON,	New York, N. Y.,	"	"	100
HENRY H. RICHARDSON,	"	"	"	100
E. G. BURNETT,	Webster,	Mass.,	Two	200
J. E. FOLETT,	Winona,	Minn.,	One	100
JOS. WARRASSE,	Newton,	N. J.,	"	100
T. M. LAMB,	Franklin,	Pa.,	"	100
W. H. DYKE,	Worcester,	Mass.,	"	100
W. H. SPALDING,	Prairie du Chien, Wis.,	"	"	100
LOUIS BELDOR,	Duluth,	Minn.,	"	100
LEWIS KURTZ,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	"	Two	200
SAM'L WARRASSE,	Augusta,	Kan.,	One	100
W. L. RATHIE,	La Fayette, N. J.,	"	"	100
W. EMERSON,	Amesbury,	Mass.,	"	100
C. H. HORSCH,	Boston,	"	"	100
MISS I. THOMSON,	Dover,	N. H.,	Two	200
BENJ. HOLLOWELL,	Sandy Spring, Md.,	"	"	100
MRS. M. H. VAN KENSELARA,	N. Y. City,	"	"	100
R. B. ROBERTS,	Warren,	Penn.,	"	100
MRS. R. D. FRANCIS,	Fall River,	Mass.,	Two	200
Mrs. J. W. BROWN,	New Bedford,	"	"	200
J. WHITAKER,	Kerhonkson, N. Y.,	"	One	100
S. H. ROYER,	Boston Highlands, Mass.,	"	Two	200
MRS. R. D. FRANCIS,	New York, N. Y.,	"	One	100
CBS. BONALL,	Salem,	O.,	"	100
G. H. BRIDGE,	Amesbury,	Mass.,	Two	200
J. T. CLARKSON,	"	"	"	200
C. W. NEWTON,	Castleton, Ill.,	"	One	100
HENRY KIRK,	Toledo,	O.,	Two	200
OTTO KLEIN,	"	"	One	100
H. G. NEUBERT,	"	"	Two	200
A. BUNNEY,	"	"	One	100
TOLEDO PRINTING Co.,	Detroit, Mich.,	"	Thirty	3,000
T. K. PECK,	Co., Toledo, O.,	"	Thirty	3,000
Westminster, Ct.,	"	"	Two	200

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 30 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 22 Vesey
Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial
Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Weston super Mare, Eng.
Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the difference between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Send $3.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

New Tracts!

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition.

FIRST SERIES.....No. 1 to No. 29

SECOND SERIES.....No. 30 to No. 59

Either Series, 50 Cents; Both, $1.00.

Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,
[32-38] 19 PINE STREET, BOSTON.

GIVEN AWAY

TO ANY BOOK AGENT,

A $5.00 GREENBACK

AND A SPECIMEN OF THE

GREAT INDUSTRIES

OF THE UNITED STATES.

1300 PAGES AND 500 ENGRAVINGS

PRINTED IN ENGLISH AND GERMAN.

Written by 30 Eminent Authors, including Horace Greeley and John B. Gough.

We want Agents in every town to solicit orders for this work, on liberal terms. It sells to all classes, and no library should be without it. It is a complete history of all branches of industry, processes of manufactures, etc. No like work ever before published. One agent sold 138 in eight days, another 208 in two weeks. An early application will secure choice in territory. Full particulars and terms will be sent free, with a specimen of this Great Work, and a $5 Greenback.

J. B. BURR & HYDE, Hartford, Conn.

Guns for the People.

Breech-Loading Double Guns, $40 to $300. Double-Barrel Shot-Guns $25 to $150. Single Guns, $25 to $200. Breech-loading and Repeating Rifles, $20 to $100. Revolvers $4 to $25. Pistols, 75c to $5. SEND STAMP FOR PRICE-LIST
TO GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, P. O. Box 1079, Pittsburgh, Pa.

N. B.—Army Guns, Revolvers, etc., bought or traded for.
[181-187eow]

HALL'S MAGIC SHADE FIXTURES!

An ingenious arrangement by which a Shade may be rolled down from the top, or raised from the bottom of the window, or both, as may be desired; thus securing PERFECT VENTILA-TION, GOOD LIGHT, and at the same time COMPLETE PRIVACY in the room.

They are an admirable and cheap substitute for Inside Blinds.

Are easily attached to Shades now in use. Are especially adapted for Office and Store Windows.

For sale by dealers in shades generally.

MANUFACTURED BY THE

CHICAGO CURTAIN FIXTURE COMPANY,

101 WEST LAKE ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

[187f]

Let the series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 10) will be sent post-paid on receipt of sixty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read
"Truths for the Times," and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word"); "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B.
Braidford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. ABBOT. This series contains in the aggregate over two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter. Address THE INDEX, Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

FOR ENGLISH AND AMERICAN BOOKS
of all kinds, send to J. F. RUGGLES, Bronson, Mich.
[181eowf]

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 21, 1872.

WHOLE No. 143.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHERRY, REV. CHARLES VOTAW (England), PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), REV. MONROE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.
F. H. BATESON, Business Agent.

Theology Considered as a Science.

ADDRESS BEFORE THE THEOLOGICAL ALUMNI, CAMBRIDGE, JUNE 25, 1872.

BY REV. E. H. HALL.

[From the Christian Register.]

FELLOW ALUMNI:—I am right, I suppose, in assuming that the one interest which we have to-day equally at heart is the advancement of our common calling. As Alumni of a School of Theology, we wish that theology should hold its own in the world of letters and of thought. Whatever tends to disable it we would remove from its path; whatever can help it we would call to its aid. You will understand me, then, and see at once the drift of the present discourse, when I say that theology, as it seems to me, cannot do the work which legitimately belongs to it, until it takes its place as a science among its sister sciences.

This is no revolutionary doctrine, as you know. It is not even a novel theory, nor do I put it forward as such. Theology has long called itself a science. The assertion lies in its very name. Every dictionary defines it by some such expression as these—"The science of God," "Science of the nature and attributes of God," "Science of religion." I am only urging, therefore, that theology shall really become what it has long claimed to be; that, calling itself a science, it shall take upon itself in very fact the full scientific character and equipment. I am only insisting that any half-way position in this regard is hurtful, as putting those who hold it at a serious disadvantage beside the departments of thought whose attitude is clearly defined and positively held. Theology, to stand on a footing of equality with others, must not only assume the prerogatives, it must take upon itself the character and responsibility, and must recognize the aim, which belong to all sciences alike.

Let me confess, however, at the outset, how sincerely I regret that this task falls to me. The further I have gone in my undertaking, the more I have become convinced that the theme, though of the utmost importance, yet belongs to one in complete command of the needed knowledge and in full possession of your confidence rather than to me. It is simply because I find the work for some unaccountable reason waiting to be done, as well as in the hope that my own attempt will encourage or provoke better men to give the subject a larger treatment, that I bring these thoughts before you.

The claim on which my discourse rests is, as I have said, already made. The very word "theology," the vast theological literature which has lain so thickly on scholars' shelves for many centuries, and which crowds our shelves to-day, the presence of this school, as whose pupils we here meet, all testify to the existence, under this name, of a distinct and important department of knowledge and a separate body of truth. That the materials already existing are sufficient to make theology at once a complete science, or that it will ever take its place among the exact sciences, I by no means assume. The single point to be considered is: this body of truth exists, and presents facts and hypotheses sufficiently tangible to enlist many minds in its defence. The one question is, Shall its materials be organized, or shall they remain unorganized? Shall its ends be pursued systematically or unsystematically? Above all, shall its purpose be the discovery of truth, or the establishment of foregone conclusions?

WHAT IS SCIENCE?

For, after all the various explanations of science, and the many attempted classifications of its branches, the simplest definition of the word is still the best, or, at least, is all-sufficient. Science is systematized knowledge. It is knowledge conscious of its own aim, cognizant of the interior relations between its facts, obedient to whatever laws will facilitate the attainment of its truth. Whatever suspicion from any quarter may rest upon science, it is, after all, simply the knowledge, whether of earth, air or skies, of body, mind or spirit, arranged by those methods, followed by those paths, and tested by those proofs which long experience has found to be the swiftest and surest for reaching the goal of truth. Whether any given pursuit, then, shall be a science or not, means merely, will it, in handling its materials, avail itself of established methods, and govern itself by recognized rules, or will it remain chaotic and arbitrary? The real alternative, let it be clearly understood, as well in the case of theology as in that of medicine or of astronomy, is not between science and something better; it is between science on the one hand and empiricism on the other.

That theology has not yet assumed the character here indicated, and consequently that the cause which I am here pleading needs to be strongly urged, none, I think, will deny. That the materials of theology still lie unmethodized, its field of inquiry unexplored, its facts untested, its very principles undetermined, will be promptly though sadly confessed, I am sure, by any student who during the last twenty years has sought theological training at any of our schools. I do not say this in censure. You will not suspect me, in any of these remarks, of an attack open or covert upon existing institutions. The evil of which I speak, if it exists at all, lies behind all institutions, and must be felt by teachers and scholars alike. None the less, however, are those who have felt the evil, and whose best years of study have been hopelessly crippled by it, bound to testify to the fruitlessness of learning, of capacity, or of fidelity on the part of instructors, in the absence of a recognized system or aim.

HOSTILITY BETWEEN THEOLOGY AND THE OTHER SCIENCES.

I find additional testimony, if it be needed, to the point here urged, in the very attitude which theology notoriously holds towards the other sciences. The hearty feeling of fellowship certainly is not there. The natural instinct of brotherhood, its quick sympathy with success or failure, its gladness in companions' triumphs, or sorrow in their disappointments and trials, is not there. Instead, we see suspicion, alarm, defiance. Theology feels itself challenged and wronged. It must stand forever on the defensive. Without looking further for an explanation of this feeling, let me suggest that it springs simply from the uneasy consciousness of a false position. Theology is a science, yet it is not; claims all the privileges, but will submit to none of the necessities; considers itself as good as any of its companions, and wishes them to know it; feels a little above them, in fact, and is not quite willing to be seen in their company. Any suspicion on the part of theology, or hostility towards theology, if such there be, on the part of the other sciences, seems to me amply explained on this ground. Among the sciences, theology is not of them; engaged in the same pursuit, it yet disdains their toilsome methods and proudly ignores their accepted limitations; seeking truth, it yet claims to know all truth in advance; dealing with the greatest mysteries, it yet professes to find in them no mystery at all; investigating problems the most intricate and most momentous, it yet busies itself not in interrogating facts, but in fortifying assumed hypotheses.

It cannot be too clearly understood, that the privileges which science offers cannot be separated from the responsibilities which science imposes. Nor should we wish them to be. To shrink from the restrictions which others acknowledge, to substitute arrogance for humility, and claim for ourselves high exemption from the necessities to which others willingly submit, is surely an unenviable distinction in the fellowship of thought. Truth will ever love those best who serve her with least reserve of personal dignity or pride. We must be content to stand side by side with the rest; to bear the same burdens; to acknowledge the same conditions; to make the same offering of vanity and prejudice; to do the same plodding work. If our science is nobler than the rest, it must prove itself so, as alone it can, by the larger spirit of humility and the finer temper of self-sacrifice which it brings to its labors.

STATEMENT OF THE QUESTION.

The question then arises—What must theology do, in order to become, what it claims to be but is not, a science? Leaving it to some more purely academic occasion, and to the specialists to whom it more properly belongs, to fix the exact relations in which theology must stand to the other sciences, or the course of inquiry which it ought to cover, let me answer the above question by saying: Theology must follow the purpose and method of science in the spirit of science.

PURPOSE AND LIMITS OF SCIENCE.

First, it must follow the purpose of science. The purpose of science lies plainly enough in its name. Science is "knowledge"—"a knowing." The purpose of science, then, is to know; to know, of course, whatever and as much as can be known.

Men have been at much pains to define in advance the exact limits which science must observe in its researches. Thus far science may come, no farther. Through the material universe it may push its inquiries; from the spiritual universe it is, we are told, excluded. Man's temporal concerns are its legitimate objects; man's higher and eternal interests are forever beyond its scope. But all such distinctions are gratuitous, and therefore vain. Once for all, the human mind will certainly know (in other words, science will know) whatever it can know; and the only legitimate way to determine the exact domain of mind is to bid it range at will among all apparent truths, and learn for itself, by actual experiment, which are within and which without the reach of its faculties. This experiment is still in process, and must not be prejudged. Meantime it is enough to say that whatever shall prove to belong to the field of knowledge belongs to the field of science; whatever is no subject of science is certainly no subject of inquiry or knowledge. To return to our point, science, having for its field all human knowledge, has for its single purpose the attainment of knowledge; the discovery, in each direction, and for its own sake alone, of truth. The decisive moment, as I understand it, in every course of inquiry, the moment when from vague and purposeless guess-work the inquiry becomes a science, is the moment when, forgetting all ulterior bearings of the truth it is pursuing, and even its own preferences and beliefs, the mind learns simply to interrogate nature, and listen intelligently to nature's replies. So it has been certainly with all material pursuits; so it must also be with spiritual pursuits. The moment which is to convert these vague, objectless and resultless religious questionings of ours into a science, or the rudiments of a science, will be the moment when, casting aside all religious prepossessions, pride of opinion or choice of conclusions, we stand simply with inquiring mind in the presence of eternal facts.

THEOLOGY STILL EMPIRICAL.

Has that moment yet come? In the case of a few individual minds, no doubt. So far, however, as the theological world is concerned, I confess religion seems to me still in that purely empirical stage which in every other quarter has preceded the birth of actual science; that stage through which astronomy was passing when still called astrology, that stage through which chemistry was passing when still called alchemy. Religion is still using its facts to serve certain ulterior ends; is elaborating schemes of salvation or perdition to startle a sinful world; has its hands always full of theories to establish and doctrines to defend; has its mind full of assumptions which no facts are to override.

Systems we have, therefore, in abundance, but no system; theologies, but as yet no theology; Christian theologies everywhere, but a Christian theology nowhere. Champions of existing formulae are to be found on every hand; but an organized body of inquirers, under no denominational name, seeking with the largest facilities and from the widest survey of the field of religion to gain all possible knowledge of spiritual things, has never yet, I think, been seen.

THE SCIENTIFIC METHOD.

In the second place, theology to become a science must adopt the scientific method. For science, having simply truth for its aim, has very naturally discovered the best method for reaching that aim; namely, the verification and analysis of facts and deduction from them of their logical results. How universally this method has been adopted in the several sciences, and what signal service its adoption has everywhere wrought, is too familiar a story to need repetition. Indeed, it seems hardly too much to say that, for the present, the progress of truth, in every direction, is almost exclusively a question of method. The one thing which ignorance has to fear, if not the only thing that truth has to ask, is the introduction into every department of knowledge of the process of induction.

I am quite aware of the ground on which this statement will be challenged. To many minds the facts of the soul and the facts of the outer universe seem so distinct that no common rule can apply to both. The method that is excellent for studying fossils and plants must necessarily fail, we are told, when brought to bear on moral or spiritual verities. With superb nonchalance, as we know very well, theological truth claims to be alone fine and subtle, while all other phenomena are coarse and palpable. The distinction is wholly superfluous. All truth is fine and subtle. Not even the fossil nor the plant tells its story at a glance. Truth hides herself everywhere under countless disguises, and only the nicest training of eye, hand, perception, understanding, enables us in any sphere to discriminate between form and substance, between unessential and essential, between appearance and reality. To see facts and understand what facts tell, let them tell geologic truth, or botanic truth, or historic truth, or spiritual truth, will ever remain the hardest task laid upon the reverent observer. And he alone is false to his position who disdains any instrument which the experience of the past has proved well fitted for so critical a work.

PHYSICAL AND SPIRITUAL SCIENCE.

That spiritual science in this way is borrowing its tools from physical science is certainly not to be denied. But why should she not, if the tools serve her, or why, borrowing, should she proudly refuse to acknowledge her indebtedness? If physical research, from the very character of its materials, was in position to discover first the method which belongs by nature to all research alike, what have we to do but gratefully to receive what thus offers itself and turn it to what we may consider higher account? No source is base from which truth emanates; no co-adjutor is to be scorned who teaches us to do our own work more skillfully or thoroughly. Let me add that he who works humbly and honestly in a lower sphere is nobler than he who works carelessly or arrogantly in the highest.

MATERIALS OF SPIRITUAL SCIENCE.

What are now these truths of religion so jealously guarded, to which we are forbidden to apply the treatment by which everywhere else man has learned to distinguish between falsehood and truth? Here are certain spiritual sentiments and convictions present in men's souls; here are historic writings containing the religious thoughts and beliefs of past ages and different nations; here are historic records of man's faith and worship in various periods of the world's life. To these we propose to apply the method current elsewhere which says, Collect and verify the facts from as wide a field of observation as possible; retain all that are facts, cast aside all that are not; analyze them and deduce from them their legitimate teachings, and accept this as our religious knowledge. Why shall we not?

Do you say, as above, these are a peculiar order of truths, of exceptional origin, to which no process of scientific verification can apply? Very well, I reply; then withdraw them at once from the field of verification and let them remain henceforth not positive truths but unverified hypotheses; sentiments, if you will, but not facts. Then, certainly, there is no scientific theology; no more is there any theology at all. This places us at once where so many of the leading thinkers of the day will be glad to find us. Theology disappears, and there remains, under the name of religion, only the spiritual emotions of individual souls.

RELIGIOUS TRUTHS MUST BE VERIFIED.

Do you say again, a theology there certainly is, but its truths are dicta not of reason but of faith? I reply: Is faith to accept everything? And if it discriminates among the objects placed before it, how can it do so successfully without the aid of scientific tests? If it does not discriminate, then all distinction between pure religion and impure, noble ideas and base, true conceptions and false, ceases forever. I am aware of the common reasoning on this point, which seems to say, the more momentous the themes presented to the soul, and the readier the soul is to accept them, so much the less questioning is to be allowed, or proof to be demanded. Permit me to offer a simpler and, I think, a better logic. Because these matters are of infinite moment, therefore apply to them all possible tests before accepting them; because faith stands ready (as the past has proved) to receive anything and everything that comes to it as religious truth, therefore, unless faith is to become man's greatest curse, protect it by every possible safe-guard, lest it be tricked and deceived, lest it dwell among falsehoods, and put its trust forever in ignoble deities. If there is any field of inquiry where the mind needs to be led by habits of strictest observation and judgment through the dark mazes of ignorance and assumption, it is precisely the field of religion.

OPEN QUESTIONS.

But, once more, do you say that to demand this exact evidence for each truth is to run the risk of re-opening many fundamental questions long considered settled? Granted; and why not? Is it any advantage to imagine problems to be settled, if they are not, or impatiently to demand to-day a conclusion which cannot be reached till to-morrow? Science does not open these questions; she only finds them open, and says so. Every question is open which is not shut. No question can ever be re-opened which is once closed. Science does us the admirable service, wherever she enters, of guarding us against regarding as forever closed that which really stands open for further and more truthful solution.

To my mind, I confess, this patient waiting for the answer, even where highest interests seem at stake, this calm suspense of judgment in the face of the most critical conclusions, this sturdy refusal to form a final opinion till the appointed hour comes and the last link of evidence is supplied, is the noblest attitude which the scholar can assume. Let me commend to you an answer which Tyndall once gave, as he himself reports it, when pressed and refusing to enunciate his views of the origin and destiny of the universe as against those which he rejected. "But surely," was the impatient question put to him, "you must have a theory of the universe." "I have not even a theory of magnetism," was Tyndall's reply. It will be a happy day for religion when the theologian, too, like the disciple of physical science, shall learn to wait patiently, though it be for a life-time, for the conclusions which he seeks, and shall form his theories of spiritual things only so fast as the facts are disclosed to him.

SCIENCE UNPARTISAN.

Yes, I allow that science, if once admitted within our enclosure, might pronounce many questions open which we now consider closed, might go behind many premises which we now consider ultimate, might question many conclusions which we now consider it right, on whatever evidence, to hold unchallenged; and would certainly stand in absolute impartiality before opinions upon which partisanship is part of our faith. In religion, as elsewhere, science would have no theories in advance of proofs, no preference among all possible conclusions, no choice of one fact over another. That all religions are alike holy and have each its portion of the truth, is to science as sacred a fact, if fact it be, as that one alone is true and all others false. That the birth of a religion is as natural as the birth of a child, is to science as holy a truth, if truth it be, as that the course of nature is broken whenever a religion is born. That the world's highest teachers come within the range, actual or possible, of humanity itself, is to science as holy a fact, if seen to be a fact, as that those teachers have belonged to some other and higher ranks of being. That certain holy writings are not infallible, if fairly proved, is as acceptable a thought as that they are; that certain books were not written by their supposed authors is as welcome and important a conclusion as that they were; that certain doctrines are not taught in those books, or are taught in one and not in another, or are affirmed in some and denied in others, is as sacred a result of critical inquiry, the moment it appears, as that those doctrines are taught on every page of every book. All these points are simply historic facts, and science resolutely refuses to view them otherwise. Upon all these questions she simply asks for the historic evidence, being solely intent upon deciphering the reality. If the evidence points one way, well; if the other way, equally well. Behind these eternal verities, let no human prepossession thrust its unhallowed head. The one thing which science cannot do is to distinguish between truth and truth, and call one better and another worse, or to call anything holier than truth itself.

WHAT RELIGION OWES TO SCIENCE.

But why, after all, need we ask whether the method of science may be applied to religion? The experiment has already been made; for better or worse, the process is begun. What spiritual science has proudly refused to do for herself, unspiritual science has forced upon her unwilling acceptance. The domain of theology has already been invaded from without; chiefly, as you know so well, from the side of philology. German critics having opened anew the treasures of classic literature, not seeing why the treasures of Jewish and Christian literature should remain closed, confidently applied to them the same key; and the new light which floods every page of our Scriptures to-day, enabling the humblest worshipper in each of your churches to read his Bible with fresh apprehension of its actual truth, is owing purely to this uninvited and unwelcome intrusion of science into the field of religion. And again, as I open this little book (Miller's "Science of Religion"), which comes to us to-day from England (though equally from a German source), I find this same philological research, pointing to the comparative study of languages as a legitimate preparation for the comparative study of religions, reminding us that "he who knows but one religion knows none," and showing us the path by which, if we will, we can trace back some of our choicest religious sentiments and beliefs, through faith after faith, to their remote birth-place and birth-hour in the human heart. And, once more, this new light upon the growth of spiritual truth, bringing religion, for the first time, into fellowship with religion, showing to each what it owes to the other, and establishing between them, in place of the old Pharisaic hatred and intolerance, the nobler sentiment of spiritual brotherhood, is the pure and unsought gift of science to religion.

The beginning then is made, in spite of ourselves. We have only to declare that the process shall continue, with our hearty co-operation, to the end. Indeed, and this is a point which I would warmly urge upon the theologian's attention, what other treatment of religious themes can be of the least permanent value, in these days, to the thinking world? Let men once learn, as they are fast learning, the value of the scientific method and its matchless efficacy for eliciting truth, and of what worth to them are any statements reached through looser processes, or resting upon a less stable foundation? What will men soon care, or ought they to care, for mere assertion and conjecture, when the broad facts of history are before them, waiting to be interrogated and to tell their own story? How long will it be, think you, if we ourselves delay to act, before the voices of those whom we are supposed to teach will loudly demand of us, if we would retain their confidence, to employ in theology, as elsewhere, that method which substitutes the eternal facts of the universe for the eternal guesses of the individual mind?

[To be Continued.]

[FOR THE INDEX.]

THE TEMPTATION OF JESUS.

In these days, when the number of those who can "bear the hard sayings" which have so long had mastership of the minds of men is growing daily less; when thoughtfulness among the people is becoming more general than ever before, and ecclesiastical imposition finds its field for practice sensibly narrowing,—there is much ingenuity displayed in laborious efforts to interpret the sacred myths, giving them a rational and consistent basis, a foundation of facts.

While the free practical Western mind revolts at the monstrosities of the oriental narrative, there is yet a generous disposition to believe that beneath the wrappings of superstition, there lies a previous kernel of fact, which could only thus have been preserved for our use and benefit. The work is fascinating and legitimate, although the result of such unfolding of the mummy-case is only to expose an unsightly handful of spice-preserved corruption.

There is no cause of complaint, unless the idea of sacredness still retains so firm a hold as to embarrass the investigation, and obstruct the reason in its thorough work.

The expositor who starts with the theory that the narrative, from its sacred character, cannot possibly be pure fiction, and is therefore necessitated to find in it enough of substantial fact to justify the dignity with which it is invested or acknowledge himself incompetent, will be very likely to be more ingenious than radical; and his work will bear evidence not so much of an honest search after what is, as an ex parte effort to what he has predetermined shall be.

That Jesus was an actual personage, with a real experience, there is no room for doubt; but many of the details of that experience come to us with such strong and unmistakable marks of an imaginative origin, that we may not receive them with unquestioning credence.

One legend tells us that he was led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the Devil. After forty days of seclusion and fasting came the struggle with the tempter, the particulars of which are given.

Statements intrinsically probable may properly be left unquestioned; and it is very likely that Jesus passed a preparatory period of hermit-life before entering actively upon his public work.

It had been the common practice for ages before his time, and it was not discontinued for centuries after, that all who would dedicate themselves to some special religious or prophetic work should absent themselves from the haunts of men for a while, and with severe abstemiousness spend the time, sometimes amounting to many years, in religious contemplation, philosophical thought, and devotional exercises.

Such a cause would doubtless tend to foster a fanatical spirit of devotion and self-sacrifice, but is also almost invariably found to induce a morbid, visionary, and eccentric condition of mind, ill suited to the accomplishment of a symmetrical and comprehensive work.

With the advancement of science and the growth of a more accurate knowledge of the needs of the human soul, and practical efforts to supply them, this practice has fallen into disuse; but we will say that Jesus knowing no better way followed the fashion of his day, and sought to learn a lesson of devotion, of duty, of patience, of self-abnegation, in the solitary school of the wilderness.

It is said that after a lapse of forty days the Devil personally appeared to him, and, taking advantage of the weakness induced by long fasting, made certain tempting suggestions or propositions. When we consider the general prevalence at that time of a fearful belief in evil spirits, and that the Devil had power to assume a pleasing shape, in order the more readily to exert a mischievous influence over the minds and bodies of men, nothing is left us but to conclude that the author of the legend or the narrator of the facts, as the case may be, used language in all simplicity, in accordance with his own and the common belief, with no thought but that it would be taken strictly and the obvious meaning given to it, which was perfectly credible to the people of that time.

Let it be allowed, then, that the writer of this account meant to say, and believed, just what he did say, that the Devil, the chief of evil spirits, came personally to Jesus with certain flattering overtures; and let it be further conceded (as it must be in the light of to-day) that he was wrong, misled by the common delusion; and the questions then occur—Was there any thing in the experience of Jesus during his retirement which would naturally give rise to such a story? Was he beset with fierce temptations which were overcome after a severe struggle; and, if so, what was their character and source?

That Jesus was susceptible of temptation, no one who refuses to accept the doctrine of his deity would for a moment deny, even if it was not expressly so stated in the account of his life. There is no reason to believe that his temptations did not come, and were not met, in the same way as those of other men, and their character in like manner determined by his peculiar temperament and circumstances.

The first of the three temptations mentioned, abhor of its diabolism, would appear to be a struggle between a mistaken conviction of duty, a fancied obligation to fast, on the one hand, and a sense of physical suffering on the other—the cravings of hunger, the inevitable revolt of nature against abuse.

That such a conflict did not occur, we cannot say, inasmuch as it accords with probabilities; though the testimony which supports it is nearly worthless, the testifier having impeached himself by his admixture of the diabolic element.

"The Devil taketh him up into the holy city, and setteth him on a pinnacle of the temple, and saith unto him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down." The semi-rational explanation of this story is, that Jesus, conscious of possessing power over all things, was strongly beset to make some startling manifestation of it, to secure the recognition and homage of the populace; but, knowing that homage thus acquired would only be paid to his power and not to the perfection of his character, he successfully resisted the inclination to make use of an unworthy means to a questionable end.

Such an explanation is, if possible, more difficult of acceptance than the story as it stands. Granting for this occasion that Jesus possessed unlimited powers, yet power, as such, has neither virtue nor beauty, and therefore is unworthy of adoration and worship.

Exhibitions of extraordinary power appeal only to the lower and grosser elements of human nature, and never exert a purifying or exalting influence.

The idea that Jesus could have been strongly tempted to resort to any means so much resembling sensational clap-trap, in order to produce an impression and gain recognition, so ill accords with the simply beautiful character which we must allow to him, that it is quite impossible to accept it.

And here also is presented an embarrassing dilemma. If Jesus was thus tempted, and by heroic effort overcame, it would seem that the self-conquest was but temporary; for very soon after, according to the true or false narrative, we find him engaged in the performance of "wonderful works," with the avowed primary purpose of proving his claim to authority and leadership.

In this practice he was constant during his life, and, when called upon for his credentials, did not hesitate to appeal to the marvels which he had wrought.

The contradiction is manifest. The Devil must be accepted without dilution, or the whole subsequent narrative must be purged of the marvellous.

Indeed, that would seem necessary in any event, unless we would make the character of Jesus abound with inconsistency and imperfection, and place him in the class of the mythological demi-gods, a combination of divine power and human passions, ambitions, and mutability. Who would be willing that the true and beautiful things which we may easily believe that Jesus taught should be in the least weakened or obscured by association with the monstrous or grotesque?

A pure, simple life; unwavering sweetness of disposition; unremitting effort for the succor of men from the sad results of their own delusions, ignorance, and folly; a tender and subtle sympathy for all; a helping hand and a comforting word for the needy and the sorrowful without respect to caste or condition; a serene indifference to threats and persecutions which would seek to deter him from the daily proclamation of the truth as it was in himself; a grand, beneficent self-forgetfulness,—if this does not command respect, love, and veneration, then the superaddition of startling and inexplicable phenomena would be worse than useless, having no other effect than to strengthen and intensify the prevailing superstition.

"Again the Devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain," &c. Here the temptation is said to have been an inclination to make use of his extraordinary endowment and opportunity to gratify personal ambition. That he might have been subject to such a temptation is barely possible; but the admission is fatal to the doctrine of his divine perfectness, and equally so to the modified doctrine of human perfectness.

A craving for worldly distinction and honor is usually classed with the lower order of human aspirations, and is supposed to be indicative of a nature gross and unrefined.

It is true that temptation and resistance are the appointed discipline by which we acquire strength; but what need of this in the case of Jesus—such an acquirement of strength implying a previous condition of weakness, which very few are yet ready to acknowledge?

It is also proper to inquire how these incidents of such a private nature gained publicity? To say that they were boldly published or even privately whispered by Jesus, would be sadly to disfigure a character which is claimed to be spotless. How painful and revolting to refined, aesthetic natures are the brazen, shameless, and dolefully boastful exhibitions, so often witnessed in public prayer-meetings, and called narrations of "experience"—a public exposure of the Holy of Holies, tearing the veil from the inner sanctuary of the soul, with the best of motives perhaps, but with no other result than to gratify a vulgar curiosity, or a debased appetite for the sensational!

We love to think of Jesus as having an unusually delicate intuitive perception of spiritual properties; and it is difficult to conceive that he would have made a parade of the soul-conflicts which he may have sustained while in his retirement, or that he would not have shrunk from the disclosure of such sacred experience even to those with whom he was most intimate; if indeed the sacerdotal attempts to translate such experience into human language could ever succeed.

It seems, therefore, that, in considering this subject, we may do honor to the character of Jesus and justice to our own reason, and at the same time do no disrespect to the writer, by taking his story of the temptations as a narrative, not of facts, nor yet as deduced from a series of known occurrences, but rather as a statement of what in his view, influenced as he was by the prevailing habit of thought and belief, was likely to have taken place, in accordance with the floating tradition of the time. And we may consider any slight resemblance between the probable experience of Jesus and the story of his encounter with the Fiend as the result of accidental coincidence, or as growing out of the general likeness of all minds.

J. A. J. W.

SCOTCH SABBATHARIANISM.—The Advance gives the following as told by the late Dr. McLeod: "Oh," said he, "you cannot imagine the narrow Judaism of many of the Scotch on this subject. Some of my friends took a yatching excursion of several weeks, on our western coast, a few summers since. One Sunday morning they went ashore to attend church, and stopped on the way at the little inn to secure dinner, taking with them a ham. On applying to the landlord to broil some of it after service, he refused, because he could not conscientiously use the knife and saw, with which to cut the slices, on the Sabbath. But, at last, he compromised the matter thus: they should take his knife and saw and cut the slices, and he would broil them! Finally, he consented to hold the ham while one of the gentlemen cut it!"

A clergyman in a Massachusetts town forgot his notes one Sabbath morning, and, as it was too late to send for them, he said to his audience, by way of apology, that this morning he should have to depend upon the Lord for what he might say, but in the afternoon he would come better prepared.

Voices from the People.

"I do not know whether I owe you any money or not; but if I do not, it cannot be long before I shall, so I send you two dollars. I find it hard to get free thinkers about here to pay for a free-spoken journal, though they subscribe quite liberally toward the erection of Orthodox churches and the support of ministers! This leads me to speak of the free-thought element in our own neighboring city of Fond du Lac. They form quite a large body there, and have hired a Universalist clergyman to preach for them. Being there a week since, on Sunday, I attended his preaching. I have heard a great deal of Liberal Christianity, and, supposing Universalism to be of that nature, I was very much disappointed to hear this minister take the position, and attempt to defend it, that he was determined to preach nothing, to know nothing, and to care for nothing, but Jesus Christ and him crucified! He did not believe, he said, that the death of Christ—he called Jesus Christ all the time—saved us from the wrath of God, for God was love; but man was a lost being, and it was absolutely necessary that Christ should be crucified for our redemption! He appealed eloquently to our sense of gratitude on this occasion, and condemned, in strong language, sermons addressed to the head instead of the heart." A portion of his sermon was devoted to the 'Sabbath' as a religious institution. So far as establishing his position that he would 'know nothing but Jesus Christ and him crucified' was concerned, I think he succeeded, and I respected him for uttering his thoughts boldly, though it was quite illogical; but what staggered me was this,—I knew the greater portion of the congregation personally, and of all I knew there was not one who had a particle of faith in the efficacy of 'Christ's blood,' or who would not laugh at the dark-age doctrine of knowing nothing but Jesus Christ and him crucified! Notwithstanding this, they sat patiently and listen to such nonsense, and call it 'Liberal Christianity,' and talk about the absurdities of Orthodoxy! Now if your paper is read in Fond du Lac, which I have reason to doubt, I would ask that people if they cannot do more good by extending its circulation than by paying for the support of such 'Liberal Christianity.'"

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at ODEON HALL, St. Clair Street, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Cash Receipts for the week ending September 14th.—David Branson, 25 cts.; W. B. Studley, 42; T. Carter, 31; J. Brockway, 50 cts.; Albion A. Perry, 32; Ernest Prausling, $50.00; H. Stagg, $10.00; J. W. Winkley, $10.00; O. A. Garrettson, 25 cts.; Miles Ellis, 25 cts.; Allen W. Lewis, 32; C. Wendle, 10 cts.; John S. Woods, 10 cts.; A. A. Knight, $10.00; Mrs. M. J. MacIntosh, 35 cts.; Joel S. Richards, 8 cts.; F. L. Comstock, 32; Albert S. Brown, 47; Nelson Threlkeld, 37; Eugene Vanover, 75 cts.; Wm. Wallace, 32; J. T. Brady, 31; A. Merrill, 32; Joshua Bell, 31; J. W. D. Palmer, 29; Lewis Kutz, 37; J. Whitaker, $10.00; J. M. Meyer, 31; M. B. Jelliff, $10.00; C. H. Watt, 50 cts.; Orville Watson, 25 cts.; J. B. C. B. Simmons, 50 cts.; C. Rapp, 15 cts.; Ann K. Hitts, $55.00; David E. Crovin, 32; Martin Caney, 30 cts.; J. B. Bewditch, 30 cts.; D. H. Locke, $300.00.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tract or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

N. B.—THE INDEX is payable in advance. Its friends should not be offended if the paper is stopped at the expiration of their terms as indicated by the mail tags. We have no means of knowing whether they wish it continued or not except by the receipt or non-receipt of the subscription price.

N. B.—Please examine the ADDRESS and DATE on your INDEX mail-tag, and report at once any error in either.

N. B.—If your INDEX mail-tag is not changed within three weeks after renewing your subscription, please notify us immediately. But do not write before the expiration of that time.

N. B.—Postage on THE INDEX is five cents per quarter, dating from receipt of the first number, payable in advance as the place of delivery.

RECEIVED.

THE BROOKS OF BUDDENHORN. By G. J. WHITE MELVILLE. Author of "White Rose," "Cervier," "The Gladiator," etc. New York: D. APPLETON & Co., 349 & 351 Broadway, 1872.

THE VICAR'S DAUGHTER. An Autobiographical Story. By GEORGE MACDONALD. Being a Sequel to "Adonis of a Quiet Neighborhood," and "The Seaboard Parish." Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS, 1872.

SIX OF ONE BY HALF A DOZEN OF THE OTHER. An Every Day Novel. By HANNAH BECHER STOWE. ADRIEN L. T. WHITNEY, LUCRETIA P. HALE, FREDERIC W. LORINE, FREDERIC B. PARKINS, EDWARD E. HALE. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS, 1872.

SAILING ON THE NILE. By LAURENT LAPORTE. Translated from the French by VIRGINIA VAUGHAN. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS, 1872.

END-TIDE. A Novel. By CHRISTIAN REID. Author of "Morton House," "Valerie Aylmer," etc. With Illustrations by ALFRED FREDERICKS. New York: D. APPLETON & Co., 1872.

THE PIONEERS; OR, THE SOURCE OF THE SUSQUEHANNA. By J. FENIMORE COOPER. Illustrated from Drawings by F. O. C. DAKLEY. New York: D. APPLETON & Co., 1872.

THE CHRISTIAN WORLD MAGAZINE AND FAMILY VISITOR. Edited by LEWIS JANE WOODBINE. June 1872. London: JAMES CLARKE & Co., 13, Fleet Street, E.C.

BLAETTER FÜR FREIE BÜCHERKUNST. Herausgegeben von FRIEDRICH SCHTENSEN-MART. San Francisco: September, 1872.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000.

SHARES EACH $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 26, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED elsewhere, Seven Hundred and Fifty Shares.			$75,000
JOHN J. STEVENS, Oswego, N. Y.,	One Share		100
C. D. B. MILLER, Syracuse, "	"		100
J. HENRY CLARKE, "	"		100
E. B. WALDO, "	"		100
G. N. STEARNS, "	"		100
JOHN M. KICE, "	"		100
MARSHALL PROSS, Minneapolis, Minn.,	"		100
S. LYDIARD, Long Lake, "	"		100
J. G. RICHARDSON, Lake City, "	Two		200
DR. D. K. BOUTELLE, "	One		100
R. E. GRIMSHAW, Minneapolis, Minn.,	"		100
Mrs. E. CROSBY, Portage City, Wis.,	"		100
W. H. ELLENT, Burlington, Iowa,	"		100
ELIHU T. OSBORN, Auburn, N. Y.,	"		100
P. C. TURNER, Albany, "	"		100
M. SCHLESINGER, "	"		100
JOSEPH KNIGHT, Troy, "	"		100
L. S. BRYANT, Dayton, Ohio,	"		100
L. F. GARDNER, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.,	"		100
J. C. CRATTENON, Rochester Park, N. Y.,	"		100
W. J. LEWIS, Illinois, "	"		100
HARVEY HAKES, "	"		100
THEO. BROWN, Worcester, Mass.,	"		100
C. W. ESTERBROOK, "	"		100
E. B. LORING, Boston, "	"		100
JUSTIN HIDEOUT, "	Five		500
A. FOLSON, (in trust), "	Three		300
JOHN WETHERS, "	One		100
F. A. GRENZ, "	"		100
E. S. DUNHAM, "	Two		200
N. CUMMINGS, "	One		100
CHAS. T. HOW, "	Five		500
GEO. H. FORTER, "	One		100
A. A. KNIGHT, "	"		100
GARDNER MURPHY, "	"		100
GEORGE HENSHAW, "	"		100
HENRY N. STONE, "	"		100
H. E. MANN, Fond du Lac, Wis.,	"		100
GODFREY GUNDERM, Ionia, Mich.,	"		100
			$80,400

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION:
CONDITIONAL STOCK LIST.

We, the undersigned, subscribers to the capital stock of the Index Association, agree to double our previous subscriptions to said stock on the same terms as before, taking respectively the additional number of shares set opposite to our names in the list below:

PROVIDED, That the full sum of One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000) shall have been subscribed in good faith by the twenty-sixth day of October, 1872,—that is, within one year from the date when THE INDEX passed into the hands of the Index Association.

ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin,	Pa.,	Five	Shares,	$500
CHAS. A. GURLEY,	Pulaski,	N. Y.	Two	"	200
MAX PRACHT,	Cincinnati,	Ohio,	"	"	200
J. N. LYMAN,	Columbus,	"	One	"	100
WALTER F. AUSTIN,	Pittsburgh,	Pa.,	Two	"	200
JAS. R. STONE,	Cincinnati,	Ohio,	One	"	100
A. M. HOWLAND,	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	"	500

In an editorial on "Religion and Education" in a recent number of the Christian Union, Mr. Beecher says:—

"But the scientific method is gaining possession of the minds of men with a rapidity and certainty which nothing can arrest, and it is certain to exert its full force upon every interest and every occupation of man. Those things which cannot or will not conform to the scientific method have but a sorry prospect of permanence. The scientific method of viewing and handling human interests sets up another ideal of orthodoxy in the place of traditional accuracy, and that is—Truth. Those who already accept this ideal seek no psychological foundation in education save that which comes from the freest and strongest training of the native faculties of the soul for the zealous and all-sacrificing pursuit of what is true. In that pursuit they find the harmony of education seeking truth by science, theology seeking truth in revelation, and religion seeking truth in spiritual insight and experience."

If Mr. Beecher had only omitted the last sentence of this noble paragraph and stopped short with—"what is true," he would simply have dropped a handful of dust which he now discharges straight into the eyes of his readers. Alas! he could not stop with "what is true." He must needs add, as he so often adds to his best utterances, a meaningless compliment to the "revelation" he was bravely driving out of doors as intrusive; and so he winds up at last with what is false. There can be no possible harmony between "education seeking truth by science" and "theology seeking truth in revelation;" that is, if Mr. Beecher means by "revelation" what all his audience must necessarily understand him to mean. Science is at sword's-points with that "revelation." Why fling this sop to Cerberus?

Truth will not be shut up in "fixed opinions." It is as easy to bottle a breeze.

The Index.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1872.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. His columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

N. B.—All letters, business or otherwise, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio."

"THE COST OF AN IDEA."

The great increase of interest within the past few years in other religions than Christianity, and the discovery that all of them inculcate in the main the same great moral ideas,—purity, benevolence, unselfishness, forgiveness of injuries, and so forth,—have led many of the noblest spirits of our day to anticipate the final establishment of fraternal relations among all the world-religions, and the speedy disappearance of the jealousies and rivalries that have so long kept them apart. It is fondly believed that these great conflicting faiths of mankind will form a close alliance with each other in virtue of the discovery that their teachings are to so large an extent identical; that the differences will fade out of sight in the strong light of the resemblances; that each religion, as a permanent power in history, can discard the special limitations now characterizing it, and yet not endanger its own individuality or organic coherence; that the world will soon enter on a grand "era of good feeling" in which all these great faiths shall lie down like the lion and the lamb in the prophet's glowing vision, and cease forever the angry feuds that have filled the ages with uproar and soaked the earth with blood. The "sympathy of religions"—what a glorious phrase, suggestive of what a sublime confederation, in bonds of love, of the vast hosts that have been so long hurled against each other in a wild hurricane of hate! The thought is enough to "create a soul under the ribs of death," and fire with a new enthusiasm the heart that has grown sick with hope deferred while waiting for the coming of the brotherhood of man.

Far be it from us to sneer at an ideal so full of the divinest beauty. None could be more quick than we to respond with a deep "Amen!" to this magnificent invocation of the spirit of peace. In its substance, that prayer for the advent of universal fraternity is a prophecy that carries its own fulfillment in itself. The auroral waves of light that a few weeks ago rolled over the midnight sky from horizon to horizon, and flashed a weird illumination almost from pole to pole, were not a whit more splendid than this great surge of longing for the unity of man which all over the globe is so patent to every eye not steeped in slumber; and such a wide-spread longing is but the beginning of its own accomplishment. If we do not share that enthusiasm for the "sympathy of religions" which counts on a future alliance of love among them all, it is only because we see that love has its laws, and nourish a deeper enthusiasm for a universal "sympathy of souls." Systems cannot fraternize; men can. But men cannot fraternize while they cleave to hostile systems.

Whoever puts himself in imagination at the very heart of the great religions of the world, and renounces the folly of trying to stretch them till they fit the bed of his own preconception of what they ought to be, will discern that their entire organic life is centred in mutually exclusive claims. In proportion to the strength and depth of his religious convictions, the disciple of each great faith cherishes the secret belief that the "sympathy of religions" means nothing but the triumph of his own religion—the final absorption of all other religions into that one which he holds as the perfect, divine truth. The Mohammedan sees in vision the homage of all humanity paid to the one Prophet of Allah; the Jew, however liberal, reckons confidently on the ultimate oblation of all mankind to Moses, and the tardy recognition by the world that Judaism alone is the cosmopolitan religion of the race; the Christian, however liberal, dreams of the day when Jesus shall be the universally accepted Leader of mankind, and Christianity the universally victorious faith of the future. And so on. They could not be sincere, and believe less. The tenacious clinging to the names Mohammedan, Jew, Christian, is but the outward sign of this deep, inward conviction—the visible badge of an invisible but omnipotent faith in the soul. Trimmers and time-servers aside, this is the great fact signified by the stubborn retention of these ancient names by those who wear them. Whoever has lost the faith signified by the name, and yet clings to it, is as a bough lopped from the tree—cut off from the vital sap, and green only for a day.

Now it is the inner and outer sacrifice of this special faith—the surrender of this secret conviction, and of the external symbol of the name—which is demanded of every one who discerns the real necessity that conditions the founding of the brotherhood of man. When the great congress of the race is summoned, it will be gathered together under no man's roof, but will be canopyed by the arch of heaven alone. Shall any one compel all mankind to crowd into his own narrow hut? Friend, you must come out of your shanty! You must give up your Mohammedanism, your Judaism, your Christianity; you must throw away your pride of nativity and tradition and discipleship; you must abandon this conceit of playing the host to all mankind! The innumerable multitudes of humanity can never grasp each other's hands while they stand, each man at his own doorway, shouting "come!" across the world. They must all meet on universal ground, in which no village magnate may claim proprietorship. The great religions with their exclusive pretensions never can "sympathize;" each arrogates to itself sole ownership of the earth, sea, and sky, and would reduce all the rest to interlopers or squatters or invaders; and each summons its followers to defend the proprietary rights thus threatened with indignity and contempt. What possibility of peace have we here? You can never abolish the war but by abolishing the cause of it—never make a treaty of peace while these exclusive claims are relentlessly urged as paramount to all other interests. Yet they are urged out of the very instinct of self-preservation. The religion that once consents to waive them vanishes out of history forever!

On this necessity we plant our feet. Narrow and illiberal as it sounds to many who cannot or will not comprehend, we have no option but to insist on the "cost of an idea"—to point out the inevitable sacrifice which must be made before the brotherhood of man, the universal sympathy of souls, can become a fact. The special fellowship of Christianity, the Christian name and connection, with all their tender and sacred associations, must be unflinchingly sacrificed by him who sees all the height and depth and breadth of Free Religion, and hesitates not to obey the necessities of its idea. This is a sacrifice imposed on no one by any Free Religious organization; but it is imposed by the genius of Free Religion itself on every one that consults no other oracle. It is futile to sigh for cosmopolitan relationships, for universal spiritual fellowship, and yet blink out of sight the necessary conditions of it, which may be unperceived, or ignored, or evaded, or denied, but can never be changed. Perverse, fanatical, warped, unspiritual, harsh—it matters less than nothing what epithet is affixed; but because it is our business in life to tell plainly the truth that is plainly seen, we must set over against the visionary "sympathy of religions" the greater possibility of the "sympathy of souls," and unswervingly point out the "cost of an idea." The idea is worth a millionfold more than its cost.

We reprint this week the first half of a noble address by Rev. E. H. Hall on "Theology Considered as a Science," to be followed next week by the remainder. It is a remarkable paper, full of fine and timely thought. That we are not alone in this estimate of its merits, will be seen by the references to it on another page by Mr. Potter, whose article arrived in season to convince us that we had made no mistake in selecting this address for the leading article of our present issue.

He who is resolved to have self-respect must be willing to pay for it the price of a genuine diamond. Most men put up with the Attleboro' article.

PRAYING AT A MARK.

The proposition made by Prof. Tyndall's friend, in the June Contemporary Review, to test the efficacy of prayer for the sick, by applying it especially to one ward of a hospital, is producing the effect probably intended. It will present the case in a vivid way to many minds, and will illustrate the weakness of much theological argument. Many of the answers it has called forth are so precisely like the arguments with which the more extreme Spiritualists defend themselves against scientific investigation, that these theologians really seem to bring down their Deity to the level of the Davenport brothers.

But, setting theology quite apart, there is something even in unprejudiced minds that rebels a little against this scientific test of prayer. Indeed, I can hardly fancy that a man like Prof. Tyndall, who knows his Emerson by heart, can regard this ingenious proposition as much more than an argumentum ad hominem—something adapted specially for theological opponents.

For, while I agree with him as to the inefficacy of prayer for the sick, I must utterly demur to this way of testing it. The weak point of the position appears to be this, that it brings merely physical tests, into the region of the emotions, as when Buckle tried to resolve suicides and broken hearts into a mere question of statistics,—“there is needed one more wretched man to make up the quota in Paris this year, as per table of averages; therefore let A B be that individual.” In the case of the proposed experiment of Prof. Tyndall, let us shift the ground a little, so as to get away from the vexed questions of theology, and try another case.

It is the frequent habit of mothers to love their children, and it is the belief of many that this love is morally useful to the child. Upstarts some Gradgrind of the affections, and says, “What right have you to that belief? Test it! Here is a mother with twins. Let her select one of those twins and love it especially, making no such effort in behalf of the other. At the end of twenty years, tabulate the result, and we shall know the precise statistical value of a mother's love!”

The obvious answer would be that you are carrying your meddlesome statistics into the realm of the emotions,—in other words, into a region of imponderable and incalculable influences! Love would cease to be love, if it could be turned on and turned off at will, like water from a hydrant. The woman who could keep back or intensify her love for the sake of an experiment would be a scientific monstrosity, and not a mother. Had she a gleam of true womanhood left, the very effort to exclude one child from her heart would only bring her heart back to him in a great reaction of affection, and she would end in loving him the best, after all. It would be as in the Judgment of Solomon, where it was the proposal to divide the child that revealed the mother.

If, then, the scientific method fails so utterly when we approach the domain of the emotions, it is hopeless to propose it in a matter which eminently includes the emotional element,—prayer for the sick. The real objection to it does not seem to me to be the supernatural, but the natural, objection. If any one prays for the sick, he is supposed to do it from human sympathy, and you cannot concentrate that emotion on a single ward of a hospital. The proposer of the plan seems himself to recognize this, when he says (p. 210) that “the unprayed-for ward would have attracted the prayers of believers as surely as the lofty tower attracts the electric fluid.” This conclusion made, his whole case seems to me surrendered; for the distinction between a ward unprayed-for and a ward intentionally left on half-rations of prayer is trivial and unscientific. Prayer for the recovery of the sick may be a superstition,—personally, I have always thought it was. But in any case it belongs to the realm of affection and emotion, and can no more be put on a basis of statistics than could a mother's love for her children.

And I suspect that Prof. Tyndall himself sees this as clearly as anybody, and that the whole proposal is only a daring scientific jeu d'esprit. It says to the clergy, “Hands off! You insist on bringing your methods of reasoning into our house, where they do not belong. Let us see how you like it when we bring our methods into your domain, where they are, no doubt, quite as inappropriate.”

T. W. H.

SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY AGAIN.

In last week's INDEX I had something to say on Scientific Theology. I have since read a most excellent discourse on “Theology considered as a Science,” delivered by Rev. E. H. Hall of Worcester, Mass., before the theological Alumni at Cambridge last June, and printed in the Christian Register of Aug. 24. It is a discourse full of matter, and deserves a wide reading. Had it come under my eye before writing the article of last week, I should have wanted to take some extracts from it, so nearly and finely does the address express my own view on the subject discussed. But it will do no harm to recur to the subject again.

Mr. Hall is especially strong in setting forth the superiority of natural science over theology, as it has been commonly pursued, in respect to the disinterested love of truth. Theologians are usually fettered by the dominating bias of some assumption under which all inquiry proceeds, and which must not itself be questioned. But the scientist is searching impartially for facts; and to him all questions are open which science itself has not closed. Let the scientific method be applied to religion, and, as Mr. Hall says, “In religion, as elsewhere, science would have no theories in advance of proofs, no preference among all possible conclusions, no choice of one fact over another.” And here is what he says on the scientific love of truth:—

“You, at least, who are familiar with theological controversy, will bear me out in declaring how rare it is, when religious doctrines are in question, whatever we may say of our love of truth, to find either combatant fighting for any thing higher than the triumph of his own conclusions. The truth which he loves is the image already formed in his own mind; and must be, for the most part, a truth which commends itself by its antiquity, its picturesqueness, or its grandeur. In science, the same word has another sense. It means the love of truth whether old or new; whether high or low; whether beautiful or ugly. It means the love of truth which others hate; it means close companionship with truth from which others shrink with loathing; it means worship of truth which to other eyes is hideous or vile. To science all truth is beautiful: the common becomes fine; the mean becomes heroic.

“So long, then, as theology knows so little of this spirit; so long as theology remains almost entirely in the hands of those who have doctrines to maintain and positions to defend; so long as it considers certain conclusions better and others worse, one result of critical inquiry praiseworthy and another blameworthy, one direction of thought perilous and another safe; so long as theology is at pains to distinguish among its followers between the ‘sound’ and the ‘unsound,’ and has smiles and caresses for those whose honest logic points them here, frowns and anathemas for those whose honest logic points them there,—so long theology needs to learn from its sister sciences the simple love of truth.”

These are words as true as they are vigorous and eloquent. Had Mr. Hall been speaking in behalf of the Free Religious Association, he could, as I conceive, hardly have expressed the position of that Association with reference to the study of theology more accurately than he has in this passage, and others, of his address. As I tried to indicate last week, it is one of the special objects of that Association to discover the way of reconciliation between religion and science; and this discourse of Mr. Hall is one of the noteworthy contributions of the time to this end.

In this connection a thought occurs which has been in my mind to utter with reference to some criticisms made on the Free Religious Association, by Rev. F. T. Washburn, in a recent issue of the Monthly Religious Magazine. The article is kind and hospitable in tone, and the only point in it that seems to call for reply is the comparison made between Unitarians and the believers in Free Religion. Mr. Washburn claims that the method in both cases is the same,—that Unitarians hold to mental freedom in regard to religious truth as much as do those who have organized the Free Religious Association; but they differ, he thinks, in respect to results. The Free Religious Association, he says, asserts the prin-ple of freedom as its method, makes that central, and, when results are asked for, has nothing to say, or can only say, “we have hardly got to that question yet;” while “Unitarians say, first, our method is freedom; and, second, the truth we arrive at by that method is Christianity, as we are able to understand it and interpret it. The Gospel of Jesus Christ is to our mind the most precious truth granted to humanity.”

Now, waiving the point whether those who are classed as believers in Free Religion do not arrive at any “results” in their own thought, and do not as individuals announce those “results,” though as an Association they make no statement of them to impose on others, I should like to inquire of Mr. Washburn where there is any theological school, at least in this country, whether Unitarian or of any other sect, in which the students begin their study with perfectly free minds, with no predisposing bias in favor of Christianity, and are encouraged to keep to that method; and how generally it is the custom among Unitarians to have arrived at the belief concerning Christianity which he announces with no predetermination, educational or otherwise, at the outset in its favor? Would a professor be likely to be appointed even at Harvard Divinity school, whatever his competence for the post in respect to character and scholarship, if his free inquiry had led him to an opposite result concerning the nature of Christianity? If not, can it be claimed that pure freedom of thought is yet accepted generally by Unitarians as the necessary method of theological study? In a country where Christianity is the generally recognized religion, and people are born into it as they are born into democracy, it is one of the most difficult things in the world to get into the attitude of mental freedom with regard to its character and claims. Yet this must be done before theological study can be made truly scientific. Well does Mr. Hall say, “our religion must cease to be provincial, and become, like science, cosmopolitan. Provincialism in religion is like provincialism in social life—has the same effect on mind and manners and heart. It makes us suspicious and ill-bred, braggart and intolerant; convinced of our own spiritual pre-eminence because other spiritual spheres are foreign to us.”

W. J. P.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY AND THE HEATHEN IN LONDON.

LONDON, Aug. 24, 1872.

The Archbishop of Canterbury was always thought by many of the clergy to be too frank and simple-hearted a man to be made the Primate of England. I remember a curious instance of his Scotch simplicity which happened some years ago. It was at a meeting at Zion College, where the National Church was being discussed. This old gentleman—then Dr. Tait, Bishop of London—remarked that the example of America should warn them of what the result of separating Church and State must be. In America the respectable and intelligent classes had pretty generally become Unitarians, and, if the Church of England should be disestablished, a similar result might be expected here. This admission, which was made in the presence of Martineau and other Unitarians, was regarded at the time as very imprudent, signifying as it did what most people know but few confess, that the natural tendency of intelligence to liberalism is so strong that nothing but the high bribes which the position and wealth of the English Church enable it to offer prevent the cultivated classes generally from an avowal of heretical opinions. The Bishop was pretty severely rapped on the knuckles thereanent, and it was hoped that, when he was made Archbishop of Canterbury, his rashness would be completely subdued by the traditions of that high position; which are that its occupant shall hold no individual opinions on any subject whatever.

He has not, however, been fully tamed. Not long ago he asserted in public that no clergyman ever recited the Athanasian creed without a mental reservation, a thing which he afterwards endeavored most unsuccessfully to explain away. But now he has indulged in a train of thought which has fairly agitated the public mind; whereas every one knows that it is not the business of an Archbishop to agitate the public mind, but to make himself, as it were, a perpetual opiate for the same.

It was at Carlisle, — in sight of the old castle wall on which, as the song says, "the sun shines fair," and in which, as history relates, George Fox was confined in a dungeon with hands and feet pinioned to the wall, — that the Archbishop was on Monday last addressing the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. In referring to the necessity for increased exertions at the present time in the cause of missions, the Archbishop remarked that the whole world had been brought wonderfully near to them. In old times the heathen had to be sought in distant lands; but now, if any one went to the Queen's or the Lord Mayor's levees in London, or walked the street, he saw the cavalcade of Burmese ambassadors — all heathen. In the Temple were some sixty Hindus studying law — all heathen. In the East End were heathen merchants, and the Chinaman's shop with its opium-smokers, described by Mr. Dickens, and another centre for Japanese — all heathen "of the worst class." No man need go now to the extremities of the earth to find the heathen; they are at our doors, and, unless we take some steps to convert them, they will soon be converting us. "I am almost afraid to say it," added the Primate, "but I cannot help thinking that this great proximity of the East to ourselves has somehow or other infected the philosophy on which our young men feed in our great seminaries of learning, and that learned men, from rubbing shoulders with those who altogether disbelieve in Christianity, have more toleration for that denial than they had in olden times, and that systems which have existed for centuries in the extreme lands of heathenism are finding some sort of echo in the literature and philosophy of this Christian country. We are told as a shocking thing that in Cape Colony the Mohammedans are making converts from Christianity; it would be far worse if the heathen of London were to make converts among ourselves."

This quaint and novel idea was followed by cheers in Carlisle County Hall; but it has awakened other ideas in far-off places throughout the country. It begins to be perceived that the Archbishop has no great faith in English Christianity, if brought into fair competition with either the emancipated system of America or the philosophy of Asia. Its self-preserving power is not sufficient to realize the transformation of the Church militant into the Church triumphant, unless it be reinforced by human power and ingenuity. Nervous apprehension may be warranted by the facts, but it is curious in our Anglican Pope, whose assumed faith is that the gates of Hell shall not prevail against his Church!

Since this remarkable expression of anxiety has been given to the world, I have watched with some interest for some response from the numerous heathen in this country who furnished the Archbishop with his theme. It is a confirmation of the first part of his lordship's statement that these Burmese and Hindus are not only able to write as good English as himself, but to defend themselves by weapons of logic which English education has placed in their hands. And these have been effectually used on his Grace in the present instance. Stung by the Archbishop's phrase, "heathenism of the worst class," these London students have asked and have received the privilege of stating their side of the question through the Times. Mr. Ardesheer B. Kapadia writes that people in England "are paid for declaring opinions and propagating beliefs they themselves do not believe in." He adds: "Such of the English statesmen and officials who watch the transition the Indian mind is passing through, and the rapid strides, intellectual and moral, which are the products of a liberal education, will bear me out in saying that the religious belief (if by religious belief is meant a system which inculcates doctrines of a future life, clarity, etc.) of the so-called heathens is as enlightened as that professed (but not implicitly followed) by the class whose views are echoed by the Archbishop. These heathens have toleration for their fundamental creed. That no religion can be considered enlightened which is not tolerant, is a truth taught by history. We infer from certain expressions which escaped his Grace that toleration has no recognized place in the Christian religion!"

But a sharper hit is made by Mr. S. B. Thakur, a gentleman who, from having enjoyed a high reputation, young as he is, as a Pandit in India, has become well known as a scholar in London literary circles. Mr. Thakur writes that it is a matter of some merriment to "educated heathens," sojourning in England, to witness the warfare of Christian sects against each other. "Each sect is never tired of pronouncing the mild curse of damnation upon the rest." With reference to the gratuitous attack of the Archbishop upon them, he says: "The cool self-sufficiency with which he begins it, his self-satisfying notion of the identity of Christianity and civilization, his contempt, very profound and very clearly expressed, for the heathen system of religion, his strong condemnation of toleration . . . all these are very remarkable." The writer then with great sweetness mentions that Indian gentlemen are thus denounced simply because they adopt the philosophical views of the most eminent Englishmen, such as Professors Tyndall and Huxley, Dr. Darwin, Herbert Spencer, and John Stuart Mill.

This thrust is terrible. It is perfectly true that among all the Oriental people in this country there is not one who adheres to or keeps up any of the superstitious practices of their country. They stand related to the popular religion of their country just as the learned men they claim as leaders in England do to the Established religion of England. There is no difference whatever between them and those eminent Englishmen. None of them is more pagan than Francis Galton, for instance, whose paper in the Fortnightly Review showing the absurdity of prayer did not prevent his being chosen President of the Geographical Section at the late meeting of the British Association in Brighton. At that meeting I heard Mr. Kaimes, F. S. A., &c., in the presence of a very large audience, denounce the whole missionary system, and declare that the Christian missionary rarely possessed so good a religion as the people he went to convert; and Mr. Kaimes, instead of being replied to and hissed, was vehemently applauded by the assembly. This may indeed be quoted by the Archbishop in proof that the conversion of the English by the heathen is, as he says, going on rapidly; but the Burmese ambassadors, who were present, and who had that very morning read what the Primate said of them, must have reflected that in rejecting Christianity they have a very large companionship among the most learned classes of England.

It is certainly true that Hindu ideas have to a large extent influenced the recent philosophy of England; but it has not been through the efforts of Indians here to propagate in this country the beliefs of the country in which they were brought up. They are in their own country heretics, and would no more seek to propagate Brahmanism here than Darwin would propagate Christianity if he were in India. The influence to which I refer has been exerted by the opening of the ancient scriptures and mythology of the East through the study of Sanskrit and the rapid progress of philological and mythological science. These studies have shown that the long venerated Hebrew and Christian religions are similar in origin and substance to other primitive religions of the East. The labors of Grimm, Bopp, Manhardt, Limrock, Renan, and Max Müller, have simply added to the list of Mythologies—Hindu, Persian, Egyptian, Greek, Roman,—two others; namely, Hebrew Mythology and Christian Mythology. If the English clergy only possessed a general instead of a special culture, they would not arraign these mild orientals in London, but they would recognize the cloven hoof and long tail of Max Müller, and not let him stay in Oxford another day. He is the devil that is really harrying them. He is doing more to undermine Christianity in England than anybody else, by showing the universality in pagan countries of the myths on which its pretended authority is founded.

But there is another fact which has to be taken into the account,—that hinted by Mr. Kapadia above when he declares that English clergymen are for pay propagating beliefs which they do not really hold. There is no doubt whatever that there are a half-dozen clergymen of the established Church in London who enjoy the highest reputation for learning and eloquence and attract large congregations, who believe no more of Christianity than does Mr. Kapadia. In private I have myself heard them express views which regard Christianity simply as the particular Oriental religion which happened to get established in England, and consequently must be made the most of, just as one would make the most of Buddhism had the historic combinations made that the religion of England.

Let me conclude with an incident which I know to be true, and which amusingly indicates how fast English scholarship is getting ahead of ecclesiastical loyalty. I have a Parsee friend now studying at one of the great English Universities. When he first came to this country, his faith in philosophy became unsettled for a little time, and he had a notion of becoming a Christian. He needed a counsellor, and he determined to converse with one of the professors in whose piety and learning he had perfect faith. This professor (I don't name him for fear it might be some day wafted back to the inconvenience of a man I admire) is very eminent as an antiquarian scholar who has written some of the most valuable books in the English language. He has a special knowledge of Eastern subjects, and knows all about Parseism. Well, to this pious clergyman—who had grown gray in a chair which only one in holy orders could occupy—my Parsee friend went, and presently confessed that he had some idea of leaving Parseism and becoming a Christian. He had a vague idea that the old clergyman would catch him up in his arms, and perhaps parade him at the next meeting of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. But, instead of that, the old scholar, who had somehow got into clerical robes, looked grave. A few minutes of silence followed. At last with a persuasive smile the professor said: "There are so many Christians, and so few Parsees,—can't you manage to stay where you are?"

M. D. C.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

POSITIVISM IN THEOLOGY.

MR. ABBOT:

My Dear Sir,—I have read with much interest your reprinted article, "Positivism in Theology." With the spirit of the article I am in hearty sympathy. To certain portions I must take exceptions. Such brief criticism as I have to make, I will state as concisely as possible.

1. What you have said of Comte and the shortcomings of his philosophy may go for what it is worth with the admirers of the Frenchman. His dreary volume I have endeavored to read, both in the French and in Miss Martineau's translation. I failed to get interested in it. From what I know of Comte, I should say that your estimate of his philosophic system is correct.

2. With your estimate of Herbert Spencer's philosophy, as embodied in "First Principles," and other of his works, I cannot agree. I look upon it as truly the modern philosophy. I know of no other that so controls and moulds the mind of to-day. The earnest, inquiring, scientific thought of the age, especially the thinking young men, are occupied with Herbert Spencer. I have good authority for what I say. I think you have unintentionally depreciated him and the position which he holds.

Granted that he does not, to your satisfaction, account for all the facts—who has done any better? Who has done, who can do, half so well? His wonderful power of generalization has never, in my opinion, been equalled. McCosh has virtually confessed this. The broad sweep of his masterly synthesis certainly comprehends a great deal. No one has more clearly shown the limits of philosophic inquiry. Beyond those limits he cannot guide us nor can any body else. You yourself have not vaguely hinted at the relativity of all our knowledge, and that "fathomless mystery" in which we were born, and by which we are surrounded and engulfed all our days.

3. "He formulates," you say, "all phenomena in terms of space, time, matter, motion, force." You go on to show that the outcome of all this is materialism. Mr. Spencer holds in common with the leading philosophic scientists of the day that a materialistic terminology is preferable to any other in conveying a knowledge of the order of Nature. "The alternative, or spiritualistic," says Prof. Huxley, "is perfectly barren, and leads to nothing but obscurity and confusion of ideas" [Lay Sermons, p. 146.]. Mr. Spencer at the same time teaches that these terms are only imperfect symbols of the ultimate reality. He is so little of a materialist, that all phenomena are to him only the expression of force. Force is to him everything. It is essentially transcendental. "This persistent force is the ultimate, unknowable cause. It may be a mode of being as such transcending intelligence and will as these transcend mechanical motion." [First Principles, page 109.]. Does it not follow that the ultimate cause cannot be conceived by us because it is in every respect greater than can be conceived? And may we not therefore rightly refrain from assigning to it any attributes whatever, on the ground that such attributes, derived from our own notions as they must be, are not elevations but degradations?

In thus asserting a transcendence difference between the object of our worship and ourselves, Mr. Spencer so coincides with the line of thought in your "God of Science" that I wonder that you did not give him credit for it in your too harsh review.

Intelligent readers have affirmed that they could see no essential difference between the concept of God which you entertain, as given in "The God of science," and the "ultimate reality" of First Principles; both being suggested by earnest contemplation of "that wondrous dynamic chain which binds into loving unity the realms of matter and mind through measureless amplitudes of space and time." I do not think that you are disposed to predicate anything more of that One Great Power than does Mr. Spencer. Therefore I think that you are a little too captious in your remark (I quote from memory, as I have not your paper by me), "He has predicated of the Unknowable unity, omnipresence, and causation, and identified it with the scientific idea of force. Theologic science can as legitimately add infinity, eternity, self-existence, and spirituality."

I think that when you come to reflect more carefully on this sentence, you will be convinced of its unfairness. In affirming unity, omnipresence, &c., of the power behind phenomena, Mr. Spencer does not affirm any known attributes. Nor do I see that they in the least define character, any more than the perfectly legitimate epithets which you add, eternity, infinity, &c. A Being possessing all these must be unknowable. I believe that Mr. Spencer would willingly assent to your additions, and at the same time deny that he had predicated ought of the nature of that Being who must be to us still the unknown God. If I understand Mr. Spencer, he is affirming that we know nothing of the nature and character of the eternal One. You may ascribe, if you please, epithets, such as infinite, absolute, spirit, almighty, omnipresent; but these are only meagre and most unworthy and inadequate symbols of the Reality which transcends all thought.

4. With regard to the psychologic objections which you have raised, I confess that I am so much of a materialist that they are all Greek to me. I think I see in Mr. Spencer a willingness to recognize all psychologic truth that is truth. The metaphysics of past ages have given us a great deal that is not truth. In assuming an independent existence for mind or soul, they have gone beyond proved facts.

While recognizing all that is lofty in human genius, and beautiful and excellent in character, Mr. Spencer, I think rightly, regards these as the actions and effects of the environment on the organism, and the reactions of the organism on its environment, and that they do not necessarily imply a soul as the recipient and agent. He probably would say: "Matter I know and force I know and law I know; but soul is a conception illegitimately thrust in." Such at least is the opinion of multitudes who find his philosophy the best expression of their views. Mr. Spencer aims to go no farther than science leads, and such, I am happy to see, is your principle.

There are other points in your article which I should be glad to take up; but it would take too much space in your ever welcome weekly visitor.

Yours truly,

EVOLUTIONIST.

[We are very glad to receive so thoughtful a criticism, and to publish it, although we cannot make here the defence that seems quite adequate in our own mind. But we will point out the following:—

1. The "unknowable" must be an absolute blank to every intelligence. It surely cannot be held legitimate to make any predicate of it whatever, as Mr. Spencer himself admits. Yet he does make predicates of it which are "derived from our own natures," and thus violates his own principle. "Omnipresence" is simply presence throughout all space; and what do we know of "presence" at all but by our own experience? Mr. Spencer does the very thing he forbids us to do, in making this predication.

2. The difference between him and us is chiefly this. He denies that we know anything of Force; we affirm that we know it just so far as it perceptibly acts. The Cause of Nature we maintain to be known in its effects. Hence Force is not to us the "Unknowable," but is rather the "God of Science," known just so far as Nature is known. This difference is based on a deeper difference not discussed in our article. In common with Mr. Mill, Mr. Spencer practically accepts the distinction of noumena and phenomena, which is part of the old scholastic luggage which science will most certainly discard; and it is because Mr. Spencer is thus not scientific enough that we find a fatal flaw in his philosophy. It is excellent as far as it goes; but the more rigorous philosophy of the future will never rest satisfied with these first rude essays at modern philosophizing. We rejoice at the tendency of Spencerism; but we look far beyond it to a philosophy which shall not burden itself with any such scholastic rubbish as the assumption of unintelligible noumena.—Ed.]

A PROBLEM.

NEWBURYPORT, Mass., July 25, 1872.

TO THE INDEX:—

The Congregationalist of the 25th instant quotes from the Christian Intelligencer as follows:—"The current of scientific thought is again setting in strongly in favor of the literal exactness of the Mosaic account of the origin of mankind."

If the author of the above quotation be a man of average intelligence, how can he defend himself against a charge of wilful lying?

READER.

[The trouble is that "men of average intelligence" in other matters often make such statements as the above, because they dare not use their intelligence at all in religious matters. They read only one side; and it is ignorant presumption rather than wilful mendacity of which they are guilty in fact. They think that the walls of Jericho are overthrown whenever the priests blow a blast on their trumpets. The only answer is to point to the still standing walls.—Ed.]

CATEGORIZED.

PEORIA, ILL., July 30, 1872.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—I will ask a few questions about Spiritualism which I believe would interest many persons, if answered through THE INDEX. The subject becomes important when large numbers of respectable and intelligent persons testify to having witnessed certain startling phenomena which cannot be explained by any of the known laws of Nature. Such being the fact, I was surprised to notice the discouragement which you gave to the subject by remarking that you had been unfortunate in your investigations, and also by publishing accounts of other cases where the phenomena were not forthcoming, as had been promised. The finding of "bogus" coin does not disprove the existence of the genuine; neither does a failure or many failures by pretenders or impostors to produce these phenomena prove that there are no such things witnessed elsewhere. Such negative accounts will not satisfy persons who have been more fortunate than yourself. I must infer from your remarks that you deny that there are any strange phenomena, thereby dividing its advocates into two classes, to wit, knaves and fools; the knaves producing certain phenomena by jugglery which the fools were unable to detect. But how are we to reconcile the foregoing with your admission of the sincere statements of Mrs. Andrews, which statements are of the most startling nature? By your admission of her sincerity I understand you to mean that she believes what she states to be true; and she writes like a very intelligent person, and one not over-credulous. She states what she saw, heard, and felt. Those three senses are the principal ones in the general investigation of scientific subjects. To say that what she supposed she saw, heard, and felt, she did not see, hear, or feel, is equivalent to the assertion that the senses are not reliable. That is an absurdity; for if the senses are not reliable, we have nothing to guide us, and we might as well cease to investigate, or even speak, for we know not whether we are speaking of anything real or not.

I have witnessed strange phenomena under the names of mesmerism and animal magnetism, and in later times what I have no doubt is the same thing with additions and variations under the new name of Spiritualism. Therefore I am prepared to claim that certain strange phenomena do occur; and I also believe them to be the same phenomena which have furnished the foundation of all the priestcraft and superstition of the human race.

Then by all means let us investigate; for if the force concerned prove to be only one of the ordinary forces of Nature acting through the brain and nervous system of man, moving ponderable substances and manifesting intelligence by the aid of man's brain without man being conscious of the part he is acting in the matter, then who can foretell to what useful purposes it may be applied in the arts and sciences, and perhaps in the detection of crime? Or if it should prove the immortality of the human soul, this would be the greatest of all achievements; for it would banish materialism, priestcraft, and superstition from among men, and place religion among the sciences, where it should be if it is to be anywhere.

We should not despair of these great results, while we appear to have such a bountiful supply of phenomena to aid us in the investigation.

Yours truly,

JAMES MONROE.

[Mr. Monroe is mistaken on several points.

1. We would by no means "discourage the subject."

2. We believe that the "subject" has two sides; and since the Spiritualist papers give only one side, it is well that at least one paper should give both.

3. Mr. Monroe's inference that we divide all Spiritualists into "knives and fools" verges on the inexcusable. We never denied the occurrence of "strange phenomena;" the world is full of them. On the contrary, we regard it as a very "strange phenomenon" that a reader of THE INDEX should not better understand its spirit.

4. The statements of Mrs. Andrews were self-evidently sincere; but we did not feel called upon to explain them. There seem to be very few persons in this world who are content to say, "I don't know;" but we are one of them.

5. The senses are in the main trustworthy, if in a healthy condition; but the history of delusions will teach any cautious mind to revise their testimony by reflection.

6. By all means "investigate" whatever promises valuable results. But do not echo the foolish complaint against those who do not investigate in your own favorite direction—particularly the men of science who prefer to continue in their own peculiar work rather than to enter into what they consider a wild-goose chase after miracles. Personally we are quite willing to investigate Spiritualism, if possible; but repeated failures in the attempt have satisfied us that little or no co-operation is to be expected from professional "mediums."—Ed.]

SWINBURNE'S POEMS.

There is one department in THE INDEX which, I trust, will be more cultivated in the not very distant future, when the material success of the paper shall enable its conductors to double the number of its pages, thereby making the contents still more attractive, more interesting, more valuable. This department is Bibliography, certainly one of the most important features to the radical thinker who expects to find reviews and able criticisms of important recent publications, of works which mark a new epoch in the sciences, discussions of current literature which is entitled to more than the customary notice usually found under the head of "New Publications" in our daily papers.

I do not propose to make a beginning in this direction; but by way of illustration I wish to call attention briefly to one work which, if I am right, has never been mentioned yet in these columns, and a work, too, which will be a treasure in every true radical's library. I speak of Algernon Charles Swinburne's "Songs before Sunrise." The author, the youngest and most promising of contemporary English poets, created a great sensation some five or six years ago, when his first collection of poetry, under the title of "Laus Veneris," and several tragedies ("Atlantis in Calydon," and "Clastellard," &c.) were published. Seldom has a young poet been more severely attacked or more extravagantly praised than Swinburne. We can scarcely resist the temptation to quote this or that fine passage; but, even if THE INDEX had more space for such discussions, the task would not be a very easy one. It is impossible to make selections and to do justice to Swinburne's genius; one must make oneself acquainted with the rare beauties of his muse; one must abandon oneself to the exquisite pleasure, to the unspeakable delight, of reading one and all of the unique, masterly poems, and long will the melody of his words vibrate within our souls!

His first book of poetry, "Laus Veneris," was essentially a reaction against Puritan asceticism; it was in rebellion against the resolute ignoring of all the more fervid affections of human nature. His latest "Songs" show a great progress, and will not fail to delight the admirers of his first production. Should we select some poems as characteristic of Swinburne's muse, showing how grand his pathos, how exalted his thoughts, how fascinating his pictures, how melodious his language, we should perhaps name "Before a Crucifix," and "Super Flumina Babylonis;" but the first of all would be that grand "Hymn of Man."

The anthropomorphic God is dying; his "elect" are crying heavenward, they call him "the Lord God of their tyrants," by his "name that in hell fire was written;" but humanity, free from superstition, has no sympathy with the dying Pan.

"And the love-song of earth as thou dost resounds through the wind of her wings,—
"Glory to Man is the highest for Man is the master of things!"

If we have only succeeded in calling the attention of a few of our readers to this remarkable poet whose inspirations, in a poetic form, are incarnations of the ideas, the impulses, of our age, we feel satisfied. Thousands of books are published every year, yet there is no denying the fact that the number of books that will live, or ought to live, is extremely limited. Very few journals encourage impartial criticism.

HUGO ANDRIESEN.

SCIENCE AND SUPERSTITION.—At a recent meeting of the Polytechnic Club of the American Institute, Mr. Boyle told the following incident:—

"At a newly-erected lighthouse along the New Island Sound, an old sailor was recently appointed as keeper. On one of the evenings, when trimming his lamp, he neglected his instructions to draw the curtains down, and the setting sun, shining through one of the large lenses, had, of course, its rays concentrated in the focus, and, as here the lamp is placed, the heat was sufficient to light it, to his utter amazement. He put it out, but had become so nervous for the whole night that his own image frightened him as it was reflected in the plate-glass of the lantern, with the dark side outside and the strong light inside. The next morning at daybreak he put out the light, when at sunrise the sun lit it up again, for the same reason as it happened the evening before. This was too much for the old salt. He immediately packed his trunk and left, without notice to any one, and was only missed when at night the lighthouse remained dark. When found in the neighboring village, he declared that the lighthouse was bewitched, that the Devil had lighted his lamp twice, and that he had seen him in person during the whole night outside the tower, looking in at him. It was, of course, his own image that he had seen. His supposition was, to be sure, not complimentary to himself in regard to his own appearance, but he was not to be induced to return at any price."

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or Representative Papers from the Index, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read Truths for the Times, and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—Ten Cents (New Edition.)

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents a conception of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testament. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no abler, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weak and feeble, and inefficiency of the system of Foreign Missions. Full of Myths, Fables, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution? Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single Copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatharian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, contains in full the Call for the Cincinnati Convention of the "National Reform Association," which proposes to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution,—the list of its most prominent supporters,—and a full exposure of the dangerous and revolutionary character of the movement. PRICE—Single Copies, Five Cents; Twelve Copies, Fifty Cents.

Also, The Bible Argument Against Woman Suffrage, a pungent pamphlet by A. J. GROVER, is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

Address, THE INDEX,
Drawer 28, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Back Numbers of the Index!

FOR 1870 AND 1871.

It is no longer possible to furnish a complete file of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address at

Twenty-five Cents a Dozen!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

Address THE INDEX,
Toledo, Ohio.

F. J. SCOTT, J. H. STOPPLET,
ARCHITECTS,
130-151
MADISON STREET (Near Boody House), TOLEDO.

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy,

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY IN ST. LOUIS, MO.

It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of Speculative Philosophy in all its departments.

Terms of Subscription.

Two dollars per volume; single number, 50 cents. Vols. I. and II., bound in one volume in muslin, will be sent post-paid by mail for $5.00. Vol. III., Vol. IV., and Vol. V. in muslin, $3.00 each.

All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor,

WM. T. HARRIS,
110-16100w. Box 2295, St. Louis, Mo.

Free Thought Literature.

"Force and Matter," by Dr. Böchner, $3.00
"Elsewhere; or Over the Range," The Great English free thought satire, 2.50
The Trial of Theism, 1.00
Secular Almanac for 1872, .25

J. F. RUGGLES,
[141-14300w] Bronson, Mich.

ENGLISH AND FRENCH FAMILY AND DAY SCHOOL.

37 W. Seventh Street, Cincinnati.

MISS C. E. NOURSE will re-open her School for Young Ladies and Children Monday, Sept. 22. Her address during the summer will be No. 33 Berne St., Boston, and from Sept. 1. as above. [135-143.]

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

Capital, $100,000.

Shares, $100.

OFFICERS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, President.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Vice President.
P. H. BATESON, Secretary.
A. E. MACOMBER, Treasurer.

DIRECTORS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, New York, N. Y.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
ASA K. BUTTS, New York, N. Y.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Toledo, O.
A. E. MACOMBER, " "
EDWARD BISSELL, " "
P. H. BATESON, " "

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. B. LOCKE,	Toledo,	O.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	"	"	Fifteen	1,500
C. CONE,	"	"	"	1,500
EDWARD BISSELL,	"	"	"	1,500
F. E. ABBOT,	"	"	Forty	4,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	"	"	Ten	1,000
QUIDO MAX,	"	"	"	1,000
P. H. BATESON,	"	"	"	1,000
E. P. BASSETT,	"	"	"	1,000
H. E. HOWE,	"	"	Three	300
W. C. FISK,	"	"	"	300
J. M. RITCHIE,	"	"	"	300
V. KEEN,	"	"	"	300
ALANSON WOOD,	"	"	"	300
WILLIAM KNAUB,	"	"	Five	500
J. G. HOLEWANT,	"	"	One	100
JOS. E. MARX,	"	"	"	100
C. ACHARD,	"	"	"	100
ASA K. BUTTS,	New York,	N. Y.,	Thirty	3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Newport,	R. I.,	Two	200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin,	Pa.,	Five	500
GEO. HOADLY,	Cincinnati,	O.,	Two	200
Miss A. HALL,	Northampton,	Mass.,	One	100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Tonica,	Ill.,	"	100
J. SEDGWICK,	Palmerville,	O.,	"	100
CARL POST,	Monroe,	Mich.,	Three	300
HENRY MILLER,	Sacramento,	Cal.,	Five	500
L. B. BURGESS,	Quincy,	Mass.,	One	100
J. L. WATSON,	Boston,	"	"	100
LOUIS BRISTOL,	Croydon,	N. H.,	"	100
J. E. BUTTON,	Olahe,	Kan.,	"	100
SAM T. DORR,	"	"	"	100
J. M. HADLEY,	"	"	"	100
S. L. HILL,	Florence,	Mass.,	Ten	1,000
W. H. SPENCER,	Haverhill,	"	Two	200
JON. P. BARRETT,	Boston,	"	"	300
E. W. WEIR,	La Grange,	Ind.,	"	300
FRANK PRATHER,	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	500
E. F. DENBROOK,	Wellesley,	Kan.,	One	100
J. T. DICKINSON,	New York,	N. Y.,	Two	200
G. J. POTTER,	Middlefield,	Cal.,	Fourteen	1,400
G. C. GLATTE,	New Bedford, Mass.,	Three,	"	300
C. G. GIBBETTS,	Kendallville,	Ind.,	"	300
Miss M. C. PERKINS,	Boston,	Mass.,	One	100
Mrs. S. EMMERSON,	Dover,	N. H.,	"	100
Miss E. EMMERSON,	"	"	"	100
W. H. DOWNES,	Birmingham,	Cal.,	"	100
B. B. SMITH,	Lansing,	Mich.,	"	100
R. B. SMITH,	Warren,	Pa.,	"	100
W. C. RUSSEL,	Ithaca,	N. Y.,	"	100
C. L. SMITH,	Toledo,	O.,	Three	300
J. N. LYMAN,	"	"	One	100
L. G. FELCH,	Cincinnati,	"	One	100
A. FOLLOM,	Monroe Centre,	"	"	100
L. O. BASS,	Boston,	Mass.,	Three	300
S. E. SEWALL,	Colebrook,	Conn.,	One	100
ELIZABETH WRIGHT,	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	500
E. B. WARD,	Detroit,	Mich.,	Twenty	2,000
A. D. WILT,	Dayton,	O.,	One	100
S. S. BOWEN,	Keokuk,	Iowa,	"	100
WM. JONES,	Peekskill,	N. Y.,	"	100
S. H. DANE,	Oskaloosa,	Iowa,	"	100
J. H. YOUNG,	Dover,	N. H.,	"	100
JOS. HAYES,	"	"	"	100
G. P. FOLSON,	"	"	"	100
"A FRIEND,"	"	"	"	100
Mrs. H. E. PERKINS,	"	"	Two,	200
WILLIAM GREEN,	Boston,	Mass.,	One,	100
"A FRIEND,"	Orange,	N. J.,	"	100
D. B. STEINMAN,	Lowell,	Mass.,	"	100
Mrs. F. W. CHRISTIAN,	Brattleboro,	Vt.,	"	100
C. W. FANCROT,	New York, N. Y.,	"	"	100
EDW. M. DAVIS,	Kelley's Island, O.,	"	Two	200
Mrs. LUCRETIA MOTT,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	"	One	100
Miss M. A. WRIGHT,	Jersey City, N. J.,	"	"	100
A. S. BROWN,	Worcester, Mass.,	"	"	100
EDWIN BROWN,	"	"	"	100
R. P. HALLOWELL,	Boston,	"	Five	500
HELI. RODMAN,	New Bedford,	"	Three	300
H. B. CLARKE,	"	"	"	300
FRANK J. SCOTT,	Toledo,	O.,	Six	600
M. L. HOLBROOK,	Houlton,	Me.,	Ten	1,000
W. H. BOUGHTON,	New York,	N. Y.,	One	100
HENRY H. RICHARDSON,	"	"	"	100
E. G. BURNETT,	Webster,	Mass.,	Two	200
J. E. FOLLETT,	Winona,	Minn.,	One	100
JOS. WAINWASSE,	Newton,	N. J.,	"	100
T. M. LAMB,	Franklin,	Pa.,	"	100
W. H. DYKE,	Worcester,	Mass.,	"	100
W. H. SPALDING,	Prairie du Chien, Wis.,	"	"	100
LOUIS BELMORE,	Saluth,	Minn.,	"	100
LEWIS KURTZ,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	"	Two	200
SAM'L WAINWASSE,	Augusta,	Me.,	"	100
W. L. RAYNE,	La Fayette, N. J.,	"	"	100
W. EMMERSON,	Amesbury, Mass.,	"	"	100
C. H. HOBSON,	Boston,	"	"	100
Miss I. THOMSON,	Dover,	N. H.,	Two	200
BENJ. HALLOWELL,	Sandy Spring, Md.,	"	One	100
Mrs. M. R. VAN RENSSLAER,	N. Y. City,	"	"	100
R. B. STONE,	Warren,	N. J.,	"	100
WM. ROTCH,	Fall River, Mass.,	"	Two	200
Mrs. J. W. STONE,	New Bedford,	"	Five	500
J. WHITAKER,	Kerhonkson, N. Y.,	"	One	100
S. H. ROPER,	Boston Highlands, Mass.,	Two	"	200
Mrs. R. D. FRANCIS,	New York, N. Y.,	"	One	100
CHAS. BONALL,	Salem,	O.,	"	100
G. H. BRIGGS,	Amesbury, Mass.,	"	Two	200
J. T. CLARKSON,	"	"	"	200
C. W. NEWTON,	Cassleton, Ill.,	"	One	100
HENRY KIRT,	Toledo,	O.,	Two	200
OTTO KLEMM,	"	"	"	200
H. G. NEUBERT,	"	"	Two	200
A. HENERT,	"	"	One	100
TOLEDO PRINTING Co.,	Detroit, Mich.,	"	Thirty	3,000
T. E. PECK,	Co. Toledo, O.,	"	Thirty	3,000
	Westminster, Ct.,	"	Two	200

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 22 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of New York, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
Miss E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Weston super Mare, Eng.
Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Send $2.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 28, Toledo, Ohio.

New Tracts!

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition.

FIRST SERIES.....No. 1 to No. 10

SECOND SERIES.....No. 11 to No. 20

Either Series, 50 Cents; Both, $1.00.

Address CHAS. E. WHIPPLE,
[22-28] 19 PINE STREET, BOSTON.

GIVEN AWAY

TO ANY BOOK AGENT,

A $5.00 GREENBACK

AND A SPECIMEN OF THE

GREAT INDUSTRIES

OF THE UNITED STATES.

1300 PAGES AND 500 ENGRAVINGS.

PRINTED IN ENGLISH AND GERMAN.

Written by 30 Eminent Authors, including Horace Greeley and John B. Gough.

We want Agents in every town to solicit orders for this work, on liberal terms. It sells at all classes, and no library should be without it. It is a complete history of all branches of industry, processes of manufactures, etc. No like work ever before published. One agent sold 18 in eight days, another 708 in two weeks. An early application will secure a choice in territory. Full particulars and terms will be sent free, with a specimen of this Great Work, and a $5 Greenback.

[196-151.] J. B. BURR & HYDE, Hartford, Conn.

Guns for the People.

Breech-Loading Double Guns, $40 to $300. Double-Barrel Shot Guns, $25 to $150. Single Guns, $25 to $200. Breech-loading and Repeating Rifles, $20 to $100. Revolvers $25 to $225. Pistols, 75c. to $5. SEND STAMP FOR PRICES-LIST TO GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, P. O. Box 127, Pittsburgh, Pa.

N. B.—Army Guns, Revolvers, etc., bought or traded for. [187-18700w]

HALL'S

MAGIC SHADE FIXTURES!

An ingenious arrangement by which a Shade may be rolled down from the top, or raised from the bottom of the Window, or both, as may be desired; thus securing PERFECT VENTILATION, GOOD LIGHT, and at the same time COMPLETE PRIVACY in the room.

They are an admirable and cheap substitute for inside Blinds. Are easily attached to Shades now in use. Are especially adapted for Office and Store Windows. For sale by dealers in shades generally.

MANUFACTURED BY THE

CHICAGO CURTAIN FIXTURE COMPANY,

101 WEST LAKE ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

[1871]

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 10) will be sent postpaid on receipt of sixty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I agree to almost every word"); "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. ABBOT. This series contains in the aggregate over two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter. Address THE INDEX, Drawer 28, Toledo, Ohio.

FOR ENGLISH AND AMERICAN BOOKS of all kinds, send to J. F. RUGGLES, Bronson, Mich. [13500w]

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 28, 1872.

WHOLE No. 144.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonise it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ARBOT, Editor.
ARTHUR WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WESTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLGOWELL, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, ROY, CHARLES VOTREY (England), PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), REV. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

Theology Considered as a Science.

ADDRESSES BEFORE THE THEOLOGICAL ALUMNI, CAMBRIDGE, JUNE 23, 1872.

BY REV. E. H. HALL.

[Concluded.]

The point to be urged is this: Theology, to become a science, must do its work in the scientific spirit. The exact meaning of this much abused term readily appears, I think, from what has gone before. Science being, as we have seen, the organized pursuit of truth, and starting always in its pursuit with the recognition of facts, its first and essential characteristic is, accordingly, the due estimate and appreciation of facts.

To those who know how rare this capacity is, to those who know the mental habits to be overcome, the bias to be overruled, the personal predilections to be forgotten, before the mind, on whatever it be employed, learns to see what is naturally before it, I need not plead the value of the service which science thus renders. Here again, as it seems to me, is one of the instances where the intellectual habits gained in elementary pursuits become of incomparable value when transferred to other pursuits. That the mind when employed in physical research (thus far the chief field of science) is more free from bias, and sees with less obstructed vision, than when engaged in social or moral inquiries, can hardly be disputed. It is very natural, then, that among its stones and grasses and stars, where fact passes for fact, law for law, and consequence for consequence, with a certainty unattainable where serious personal interests are at stake, the mind should first gain that keen perception of realities and loving sympathy with truth as truth, which may fitly be called the scientific spirit.

LOVE OF TRUTH.

Has theology yet reached this point? You, at least, who are familiar with theological controversy, will bear me out in declaring how rare it is, when religious doctrines are in question, whatever we may say of our love of truth, to find either combatant fighting for any thing higher than the triumph of his own conclusions. The truth which he loves is the image already formed in his own mind; and must be, for the most part, a truth which commends itself by its antiquity, its picturesqueness or its grandeur. In science, the same word has another sense. It means the love of truth whether old or new; whether high or low; whether beautiful or ugly. It means the love of truth which others hate; it means close companionship with truth from which others shrink with loathing; it means worship of truth which to other eyes is hideous or vile. To science all truth is beautiful; the common becomes fine; the mean becomes heroic.

So long, then, as theology knows so little of this spirit; so long as theology remains almost entirely in the hands of those who have doctrines to maintain and positions to defend; so long as it considers certain conclusions better and others worse, one result of critical inquiry praiseworthy and another blameworthy, one direction of thought perilous and another safe; so long as theology is at pains to distinguish among its followers between the "sound" and the "unsound," and has smiles and caresses for those whose honest logic points them here, and frowns and anathemas for those whose honest logic points them there, so long theology certainly needs to learn from its sister sciences the simple love of truth.

PREJUDICE AGAINST THE SCIENTIFIC SPIRIT.

Still, I am quite aware, however the argument may stand, that the most formidable obstacle to the scientific interpretation of religion lies at exactly the point where we now are. To the common thought the "scientific spirit" inevitably stands in antagonism to the religious spirit. To the popular imagination the term "fact" always stands for something hard as rock and cold as ice. To deal constantly with facts, to discriminate sharply between the ideal and the real, to pursue truth through all its windings and concealments, strip it of all its costumes and look into its unveiled face, is regarded, for some reason, as a very heartless and unpoetic proceeding. "Religion," we are sure to be reminded, "is an affair of feeling and sentiment; not therefore to be subjected to close analysis." Excuse me, however, if I still ask, with prosaic scepticism, and in the heartless application of the very method so disdainfully rejected, for the exact facts on which this plausible theory rests. Where is the sphere, either of literature, of morals, or of art, in which the contemplation of actual facts has proved destructive to imagination or feeling? Shall Greek sculpture be pronounced inartistic for being so closely observant of anatomical facts? Does the painter mock our sense of beauty when he follows, by exact study, nature's forms and colors and lines? Is Shakespeare no poet for recognizing at every step the actual movements of the human mind, or the genuine play of human passions? Are the divine realities so small and poor that the imagination must break loose from the universe to find materials worthy of her use? Or is it true that just where we hold ourselves closest to Nature's facts, there both imagination and feeling, with wonder and reverence and awe as well, find themselves most at home? And is it supremely true that it is this exact inquiry into human history, and human passion and thought, together with the microscopic investigations of science into the hidden processes of this very despised world of matter, which alone has enabled the modern mind to climb to those dizzy heights and sweep over those vast fields of generalization, before which men's souls would once have sunk fainting as before forbidden visions of glory and sublimity?

TEMPER OF RELIGIOUS CONTROVERSY.

It seems somewhat humiliating, yet it is quite necessary, to mention still another argument in behalf of the scientific spirit. Its presence will improve immeasurably the temper of our religious controversies. If we are to trust appearances, we may safely say that bitterness and invective enter into discussions just in proportion as they are unscientific. The more science the less temper. The two most passionate sciences of the present day, I suppose, are the two crudest—Theology and Political Economy; each freely substituting sneer and detraction for argument, each vying with the other in violence, personal-ity, innuendo, and in a certain partisan virulence which we look for in vain in the ordinary discussions of botanists or geologists or chemists. If I am here reminded that Theology and Political Economy are precisely the two sciences which deal most immediately with men's personal interests, and must necessarily, therefore, be discussed with greater warmth than any others, I reply, You are but putting my own assertion into other words. A scientist becomes a scientist in the very measure in which it extricates itself from the personal bearings of the truths it handles, and learns to see them in their impersonal and universal relations. If it is harder for one science to do this than for another as it unquestionably is, so much the more reason for effort. Without pressing this obvious point into unnecessary detail, let me hazard the prediction that the moment theology rises to the impersonality of science, that moment all animosity will depart from our theological discussions; and that then, instead of childishly banishing from every professional gathering those grand themes which alone interest thoughtful men, and alone affect the highest welfare of the race, we shall find ourselves frankly inviting attention to these very themes; eliciting from every earnest mind its honest thought, intolerant only of crudeness and ignorance, and heartily welcoming an unreserved treatment of the profoundest and most delicate problems.

PROVINCIALISM IN RELIGION.

To put this same thought into other words, our religion must cease to be provincial, and become, like science, cosmopolitan. Provincialism in religion is like provincialism in social life; has the same effect on mind and manners and heart. It makes us suspicious and ill-bred, braggart and intolerant; convinced of our own spiritual pre-eminence because other spiritual spheres are foreign to us; jealous of the approaches of cultivated thought, because we are ill at ease in its presence.

Before leaving this part of my subject, let me say, if it be necessary, that what I have claimed for the true scientific method and spirit, I would by no means be understood as claiming indiscriminately for individual men of science. That men of science, like all others, are often false to their own ideals, and even fail at times to apprehend the strength or grandeur of their own position, I do not need to be told. I am speaking only of those whose science is real. Let us be just. If we have much to teach, we have also much to learn; and I do not hesitate to say that, for lessons of generosity, of charity, of honesty in statements of belief, of fearless confidence in the leadings of truth, religion must be a learner to-day in the school of science.

OUR DUTY AS PREACHERS.

One thing more and my task is done. I have not forgotten that I am addressing to-day, not a body of professed theologians, but practical workers in the Christian ministry. We are met, not to arrange a course of study, but to consider together the interests of religion. None the less, however, do I believe that the thought which I am trying to present, if important at all, is important for us.

I need not remind you that, however practical our ministry may be, and however solicitous we may ourselves be to avoid technical controversy, we yet cannot, and certainly do not, escape the occasional consideration of theological truth. Though our doctrinal ideas be very few, yet those few involve the whole. As a matter of fact, the minister's knowledge is popularly supposed to cover the whole field of theology, and his utterances are listened to, by that portion of his hearers at least who are most in need of correct instruction, as words of authority. As a matter of fact, too, the preacher seldom shrinks from this responsibility. It would be hard, I suppose, to find any parish minister, whatever his training, who had not a positive opinion, ready at call, upon the origin and authorship of the Scripture books; upon the historic position of Christianity and its exact relations to other religious faiths; upon the miraculous element in religion; upon the destiny of the soul; upon the reality, if not the exact details, of the future life. Yet these are the exact equivalents of points on which, in other sciences, no one is expected to pronounce an opinion, and no honest man wishes to pronounce an opinion, who has not carefully surveyed his ground, and cannot support his opinion with adequate testimony. In other words, these are points in regard to which, from any high point of view, only one alternative is possible,—either absolute silence upon them, or thorough knowledge and command of the entire evidence.

It must not be forgotten that the moment doctrines are touched, the minister becomes a theologian. Moral excellence, purity of character, piety, devoutness, have no more to do with such critical inquiries as those above alluded to, than has muscular strength or mechanical ingenuity. For theological points only theological training would do. Were I a layman, I would as soon ask my butcher these questions as ask my minister, unless my minister were a thoroughly equipped scholar and a trained theologian.

The inference is clear. In the highest sense, it is true, we can hardly any of us be theologians. The limits of our education, the primitive condition hitherto of theological science at our schools, and the fact that we have been fashioned according to another type, make the full theological position unattainable. In another sense, however, this scientific temper of which I have been speaking can help us all in our most practical work. If it cannot lift us to the highest virtues, it can help us at least to avoid the vices to which our profession is peculiarly exposed. Let me occupy what time remains in pointing out, however briefly, two ways in which this may be achieved.

AN AD: HERE DELIVERED BEFORE THE PITTSBURGH PA., RADICAL SOCIETY, JULY 14, 1872, BY GEO. H. HOLTMAN.

INTELLECTUAL HONESTY.

First, we may all learn from science to recognize the conditions of honest thought. May I put this in another way by saying, we may learn to be honest in our religious thinking? The fine characteristic of science is its conscientiousness. I do not so much praise it for this as point out the characteristic. Advancing always from fact to fact, testing and being tested at each step by rigid demonstration, it learns by stern but beneficent necessity to recognize always the exact limits of its knowledge. To assert what it does not know, to feign certitude where there is none, to claim evidence where evidence is wanting, is so foreign to its methods and so sure of instant exposure, that intellectual honesty becomes part of its very being. Scientific writers, when defending themselves against the assaults of the church, might safely, I think, if they thought it worth while, challenge their opponents to produce treatises from the whole realm of Christian theology which deal with the reader so sincerely, which point out so frankly the limits of the writer's knowledge or the character and extent of the evidence from which he speaks, as do the best scientific treatises of our own generation.

Now, it is precisely this intellectual habit which we as preachers eminently need. Say what we will about the difference between scientific and religious evidence, it is not pleasant to be told, while it is certainly hard to deny, that if we would bear looseness of reasoning, recklessness of statement, audacity of assertion, repetition of facts a thousand times denied and arguments a thousand times refuted, with the cool assumption of absolute knowledge in realms of truth where testimony is lacking and certainty is impossible, we must listen, not alone to the ravings of the revival-halls, where raving is expected, but to the calm utterances of many of our most learned pulpits. I do not deny that the fault is largely unconscious. Its unconsciousness is the very point.

RESPONSIBILITY ATTACHING TO PUBLIC SPEECH.

Has it then come to this? Because religious truth differs in the character of its evidence from other truth, are we therefore to give ourselves unfettered scope for assertion and dogmatism? The less defense our hearers have against our persuasions, the less our responsibility to guard our words? I rather believe the contrary. The farther removed from positive proof is the thought we utter, so much the more cautious are we bound to be in our utterance. The more we call upon our hearers to believe, the graver, I am sure, is the moral responsibility we incur to measure each statement, to weigh each word, to frankly disclose the nature of our information and our testimony. Believe me, science will have done much for us, if it has simply introduced into theology that instinct of honesty, not unknown elsewhere, which reveals to the uninitiated the exact point where facts end and conjecture begins; the point where certainty ceases, and beyond which only hypothesis is possible.

THE HISTORIC SENSE.

There is still one other way in which, as it seems to me, science can greatly aid us as preachers. It can help us to cultivate what I have already designated as the scientific spirit, but what in this connection may be more specifically styled the historic sense.

The truths with which we have to deal, while of supreme importance, are yet, as we all know, somewhat vague and undefined. Differing in their nature from the facts of physical science, they differ still more in having been as yet but carelessly observed, inadequately tested, imperfectly classified, and loosely and illogically analyzed. In the nature of the case, too, nowhere is the bias of preconception stronger, or the weight of established opinion greater than in religious belief; nowhere is it easier to see what makes for our own conclusions, or harder to see what makes against them. In no other calling, therefore, is the mind in greater danger of catching a distorted image of the object at which it is looking, of missing the fine line which separates truth from falsehood, of mistaking the creations of its own fancy for the eternal laws of God. In no other calling, in a word, if we are simply anxious to know the truth, do we stand in greater need of that sharp eye for facts and quick discrimination between the apparent and the real which only a scientific training seems able to insure.

Thus far but slight effort has been made to cultivate among us this scientific instinct. While held in high esteem elsewhere, in theology it is viewed in the light of a disqualification rather than an aid. A decided prejudice in favor of recognized belief has always been held in higher favor than the impartial temper which searches simply for historic truth; while instead of welcoming with gratitude those who bring finely-trained critical faculties to bear upon spiritual things, theology rebukes them rather as importing into holy places the tools of a baser trade.

I trust that I am wrong in my opinion, but nothing, I confess, seems to me rarer, even in our own portion of the theological world, than this historic feeling of which I speak, or than even the desire to possess it. I cannot find that it is even prized, at least in comparison with other and far inferior gifts. I trust that I am mistaken in my interpretation of what I read and hear, yet it seems to me that countless questions are under discussion to-day as matters of personal opinion, of religious sentiment, of intuitive perception, of denominational belief, which a nicer critical sense would assign instantly to the realm of historic evidence, and refuse to treat on other grounds. What I seem always to hear, even when the specific tenets of Christianity or exact points of criticism are under consideration, is, Are these doctrines safe or dangerous, proper or improper? Whither will they lead? How will they affect our faith or the soul's belief? How do they accord with the divine purposes or the divine attributes (known apparently to each denomination)? The one question which I seem never to hear is, Is it true?

I am sincere in disclaiming too great positiveness on this point; nor would I go a single step beyond the familiar facts. Yet I cannot tell you how I deplore the singular lack among ourselves of this inestimable quality. I cannot tell you how its absence seems to me to vitiate our most laborious researches and to neutralize our most accomplished scholarship. Nor do I dare to say how fatally it seems to me to harass and embitter our denominational fellowship. It makes those strangers who should be friends; it sends into different paths those who should be walking hand in hand; it breeds mutual misunderstandings in breasts whose sympathies should make them one.

Among all our apparent differences, this has long seemed to me the only one which is worth a moment's thought. Doctrinal distinctions are transient and superficial; but until we can learn to take to our fellowship, and rate at its full worth, that delicacy of feeling which shrinks from any statement to which personal conviction does not fully respond, no perfect unity is possible.

We are wont to make merry over this sensitiveness of the intellectual conscience. It has long been the football of our most boisterous sport. I would view it rather as the finest gift ever bestowed upon theologian or minister; as the one rare trait which no rudeness must insult, and to which, however slightly we may ourselves possess it, we none the less owe our profoundest deference and homage. Certain it is that to the regard which we pay to this quality, and to the successful cultivation among ourselves of a more delicate and keener sense of truth, we are to look, if anywhere, for the realization of that perfect spiritual fellowship which has long been the dream of generous souls.

I will not add to my discourse any qualifications or reservations, but must leave it to explain itself. I know not how aggressive I have seemed. I shall be glad to know that all I have said is among the commonplaces of your daily thought. In any case, I do you the justice to believe that whatever truth there may be in my discourse, however unpalatable it may seem, you will thank me for having spoken. We are not children, but men; and will tolerate from each other anything but unfaithfulness to the high interests of our calling.

OUR RELATIONS TO THE UNIVERSITY.

One word more as I close. Within a few years our much-loved University, catching in its best sense the scientific spirit of our age, has put herself in fresh contact, at almost every point, with the advances of modern inquiry, and shown how even those pursuits with which the temper of the times seems least in sympathy may yet gain new life by the application of stricter methods and a wider search for truth. One department after another has felt the new impulse and taken its higher place. Is ours alone to be left behind in this noble rivalry? I speak without reserve, for I speak not of men but of methods and means. And I speak the more openly because, unlike the others, we have lost ground to recover and shameful disgraces to retrieve. We have a past behind us which we can remember only to be stung by it to a prouder consecration to the cause we have so faithlessly betrayed.

Let us demand, then, for our own department, the same enlargement of facilities, with the same thorough methods and tests, which are elsewhere promising or already bearing such admirable fruits. Let us ask, in justice, that as our University is striving to send out into our sister professions men thoroughly fitted for their work, and ready to meet any competition, so she shall send at last into the field of the ministry men fitted to take their place in the ranks of the best theological scholarship. And, this being done, let us promise that no word of ours, either of timid counsel or of faithless fears, shall deter the young minds that gather here from winning for themselves the broadest culture, and learning to govern themselves by the simple love of truth.

One of the most difficult things we have to do, or rather, I should say, to undo, is the abandonment of words that, owing to the progress of knowledge, have no longer any real meaning in the sense in which they have been previously understood; words that, having been used to express certain ideas, and the ideas themselves having become obsolete, have lost their significance. This difficulty, however, is not without its advantage, as otherwise the man of greatest progress would speak a language comparatively unintelligible to most of his contemporaries.

The term "hereafter," used to express the idea of another life, after what is commonly denominated death, is a misnomer of the class alluded to. Whether or not there remain anything of the mind, or soul, or whatever we may please to call it, when the form that we can now see and feel has crumbled into dust, there can be no other life. The conscious, individual person either passes into oblivion, when his outward structure ceases to perform the functions of intelligent motion, or else lives on—the same, identical, conscious individual—in some other form not palpable to the normal human sense. While conforming for custom's sake to the popular sense of the term "hereafter," in announcing the title of this paper, I shall endeavor to divest my language, as much as possible, of that form of phraseology which makes a distinction between life in the visible body and life separated from it.

I appreciate the difficulty of an effort to demonstrate what is commonly regarded as beyond the reach of direct proof. "Revelation" must be abandoned as evidence, it having positive value as such only to the direct recipient of it. The more ancient claim for this class of testimony is further barred by its remoteness and contradictory character, while that of the present time is yet too new, too marvellously startling to the common matter-of-fact mode of reasoning. Having premised so much, I can only hope to furnish some views sustaining a strong probability that the proposition I would make is well founded.

I submit just here, however, this question. While I will not cavil at the hard conditions imposed by the materialist in such a case, is this positive theory, as to the kind of proof requisite to establish a psychological problem, always to be held an unerring one? If so, then all evidence of new discoveries in the realm of the invisible—a realm vaster, to my conception, than material space—is useless. The consequence would seem to be, that all researches in the direction most interesting to the race must arrive in the very beginning at an effectual barrier,—a closed door upon which is inscribed, not by Nature but by the conceit of man himself, "Thus far shall thou go, and no farther."

Without urging the claim (equally positive with the materialist theory) made by many intelligent investigators in the region of psychical science, that they have in various ways penetrated the veil which hides from the common observer positive knowledge on this subject, there are still reasonable grounds for the theory that mind, soul, or spirit is not perishable.

The universal inborn desire of mankind to live continuously furnishes a strong presumption in favor of its probable realization. This desire has always animated the breast of man, so far as we can trace the history of the race; and it has almost invariably borne the fruit of a more or less firm belief that its realization may be confidently expected. This desire pervades all grades of minds, and is not dependent upon nor affected by varying theories as to the status of the continuing spirit. It has outlived many theological systems, and has undergone no change amid total revolutions of other mental conceptions. It is of the same quality in the ignorant as in the cultivated man, in the inexperience of youth as in the maturity of advanced age. It needs not to be inculcated, and is complete without culture. I argue, therefore, that it is a gift from Nature, and as such cannot be useless. Its use, I infer, is to teach us that life is inextinguishable.

There are exceptions, certainly, to this rule of desire begetting belief, and perhaps even to the presence of the desire itself in the mind. The latter condition, however, is a class of disease. A low grade of belief, an undefined dread, is the result of this state. I cannot resist the temptation to illustrate this, by introducing that fine type of mental derangement described by Shakespeare in Hamlet's memorable contemplation of suicide:—

"To die—to sleep—No more."

—in a moment, the insincerity of this declaration appears in this reflection:—

"And, by a sleep, to say we end
The heart-ache, and the thousand natural shocks
That flesh is heir to,—'tis a consummation
Devoutly to be wished."

At this pause the coveted oblivion is doubted, and apprehension finds expression thus:—

"To die—to sleep:—"

To sleep! perchance to dream!—ay, there's the rub:
For in that sleep of death what dreams may come,
When we have shuffled off this mortal coil,
Must give us pause. There's the respect
That makes calamity of so long life;

For who would bear the whips and scorns of time.

But that the dread of something after death—
The nudged country, from whose bourne
No traveller returns—puzzles the will,
And makes us rather bear with the lile we have,
Than fly to others that we know not of."

The materialist, even the rank atheist, will generally acknowledge the desire for continuous life, and, though they have cultivated so severe and material a theory as to any true standard of proof, that the finer elements of mental demonstration are discarded, yet the most they can urge is that to them the thing—even that which seems so harmonious with our highest aspirations—is not yet satisfactorily established.

Another consideration from which I deduce continuity of life is the relation of the visible human form to the invisible mind, and their respective capacities for duration as individuals. At this stage, it is proper to assume that there is a real distinction between the mind and the body; that they are separate individual things, the conjunction of which forms the intelligent, visible being. Boerhaave and many other illustrious writers have furnished valuable dissertations upon this distinction, satisfactorily deducing it upon philosophical grounds. A single simple instance, which I take from one of these writers, is this: "A man wills to move a palsied limb; the mind is unaffected by the paralysis, but the muscles refuse to obey the volition. The distinction between the person willing and the instrument to be wielded is unavoidable."

From the structure of both body and mind, so far as we are able to penetrate the mysteries of the latter, we observe that the human form is adapted to the use and growth of the mind during only a very short time. The purpose of the connection and relation between the two seems fulfilled, judging by the analogies of nature, even under the most favorable circumstances, the most economical husbandry of the physical elements, in less than a hundred years. What a speck of time is this, relative to the vast system of the universe with which the mind seems intimately connected and apparently destined to explore, while the body only feebly assists, to the extent of wandering over and digging into the bare surface of one small planet! This splendid physical mechanism, which yet wears out in a hundred years—how inferior in endurance to that mysterious inhabitant whose temporary dwelling-place and servant it is! In its structure it is indeed wonderful; and in the prime of its beauty and strength would seem almost fitted to be a perpetual temple for the monarch within. But, alas! the zenith of its power is momentary; its best days are soon past; the muscles relaxed, the tissues barely cohesive, the senses but faintly responding to desire, and the whole machine, in short, loosening in every part, prior to dissolution.

Meantime, the mind is but developing into greater fullness and power. As the body decays, the soaring mind seems impatient of confinement, and apparently assists in the destruction of its useless tenement.

The mind rebels at the idea that it must perish with the visible organism which has been but its executive. It resists as an injustice that it, the living, shall be entombed along with its decrepit and dying companion; for it is unnatural and repulsive to the mind to contemplate itself as extinguishable. It has a dim consciousness of a yet higher destiny—a vague revelation from itself, so to speak, of unknown powers yet to be developed, of vast capacities yet to be discovered, of superior occupations yet to engage its energies—those energies that have but begun to put on the sinews and muscles of power when the visible human form has exhausted its efficiency. Goethe said, on the occasion of the death of Wieland, "The destruction of such high powers is something which can never, and under no circumstances, even come into question." A writer, who quotes this passage, adds, "Such a dogmatic expression of conviction resting on bare philosophical grounds, from a mind so equipped, so acute, and so free, has great weight."

To pursue still further this distinction between visible matter and the principle which animates it, with special reference to the relative importance of their individual preservation, let us view some of the distinctive properties of each.

All human bodies may be said to be alike. Certain elements may be in larger or less proportion in some bodies than in others, but the elements themselves are identical; and these may in every case be dissected, weighed, measured, and exactly ascertained.

The mind within possesses a similar resemblance to other minds; the differences being occasioned either by an original preponderance or inferiority of certain faculties, or else by more or less culture. These latter elements, however—if they may be so named—elude the grasp of the chemist, and can only be approximately estimated by the mind itself. This is also true of other invisible sources of nature, but it does not preclude the idea that they, as well as the vital principle of man, are of a refined order of matter which we have not yet knowledge enough to analyze and classify.

Another marked distinction between visible matter in human form and mind is, that, while the elements of the former are eventually distributed, the latter, from its nature, must remain a whole, whether living or extinct. For who can conceive of a single component of the mind separated from its associates? Nature seems, at least, to have made no provision for such an anomaly.

It is evident that mind is the real idea of life—the visible form only the expression of it; mind is the governor—the physical structure the subject of government; mind is the workman—the body but the implement or tool. When the latter becomes incapacitated, we see no necessary diminution of the former. For example, the body loses a member—a leg or an arm; the mind has lost none of its power, though it cannot be quite so effective in all directions with a damaged tool. Yet its resources are wonderful even in such a case. It is well known that the entire loss of a sense—say, that of sight—is compensated for by the endowment of a double power to some other sense, say, of feeling or hearing.

Thus we see the mind—the real individual man, the workman—adapting itself to the exigency of an accident to the machine. These remarkable adaptations are usually cited as phenomena, but I feel justified in offering them as evidences that life itself is not liable to the interferences which produced changes in the visible expression of it.

May I not logically reason, then, that "death" is but the last and irreparable accident to the machine—analogue to the final stage of other mechanisms,—when it must be laid aside for not only a newer, but one more fitted to the advanced knowledge and capacity of the user?

It might be objected by some that the occurrence of insanity destroys the force of this reasoning, by showing the mind injured while the body remains sound and vigorous. This, indeed, occurred to me with some force at first; but on reflection I conclude that the objection has no very great force. The injured body, however well repaired, is never so good as when new, while we know that the unbalanced reason is frequently restored, with no part depleted; and may we not reasonably infer that, when we do not witness this restoration, it is because we cannot follow the case far enough? If life be continuous, there is ample opportunity for the mind's recovery. As for the body, we may and do readily see the last of it, so far as its collective individuality is concerned. We acknowledge, too, the propriety of its dissolution. Where this occurs prematurely, as in the case of infants and hale young persons, we know that some violated law has but executed its unerring sentence. And these very cases suggest, as a certain writer says, "a caprice in the dispensation of death indicative of a hidden sequel."

But where is the evidence, not only of the thing as a fact, but even of the probability, the desirability, the propriety, the consistency with nature in other forms, of the dispersion of the elements that make up the conscious life?

Annihilation is not true of anything; and if, as I have assumed, the mind is not dissolvable, its components only apparently separable in order to be adapted to our ability of recognition, its entity only a fact as an individual whole,—how can life composed of these be extinguished, any more than a particle of matter can be annihilated?

If, on the other hand, we suppose the possibility of dealing with the mind as with the physical structure, of disintegrating and dismissing it in separate elements, what a strange difficulty presents itself! Where would be the place in nature of the faculty of thought, the will, the conscience, the affections, and other components of the mind, set free from their association?

If this reasoning be so far true, there seems to be but one refuge for the disbeliever in continuous life: that is, that the mind is NOTHING! If this be true, then the body ought to get along as well without the mind as with it, and ought to perform its functions perpetually. But as this is absurd, and contradicted by the commonest experience, we are justified in concluding that mind is SOMETHING; that it is conjoined with the visible form for a time, but destined to be separated from it; that this separation is the phenomenon called death. As the inanimate body cannot be annihilated, neither can the mind; and further, as the latter, by the laws of its construction, is not dissolvable into elements, it must remain forever—LIFE!

The "Development Theory," which has lately attracted the attention of many of the best thinkers of the world, and which seems to be the most rational method of accounting for the various and ascending forms of matter, seems to me a strong attestation of the continuity of life. The visible world having been prepared, by many gradations, for life as we now find it, changes are still going on for adaptation to a more developed type of life. The resources of nature are so illimitable, we may contemplate grade after grade of life, each successive one a refinement of the last preceding. A good illustration of this, by analogy, is the butterfly succeeding the worm. The caterpillar—scarcely more ignorant of its destiny than man—coils itself up to die; when, lo! a new and glorious birth,—a creature of finer texture and superior conditions. The caterpillar's coarser senses probably do not recognize the butterfly. May not something, impalpable to the butterfly, emerge likewise from it?

Finally, a consideration of the moral faculties—the evident purpose of their ultimate perfection, and the small progress attained towards their completeness in the present form of life—inclines me, perhaps more strongly than any other consideration, to the belief that continuous life is not only highly probable, but a positive necessity.

While the theory of hereditary guilt is preposterous—at least to me—yet, from the intimate connection between the moral faculties, as part of the life principle, and the physical structure, it arises that more or less imperfection of the moral sense is innocently inherited. Besides this, the propensities, the necessities, the demands of the house of flesh that we live in are of a nature to retard the growth of those faculties. Hence that perpetual struggle between an active conscience and a vacillating will.

Is it not reasonable, then, to look forward to life with more favorable conditions for advancement in knowledge, in power, and in goodness?

Let any should say, "If this form of life is such a hindrance to the mind or soul, where is its utility,—why not skip this period altogether, and enter at once upon the superior state?" I reply, The benefits of a lesson in adversity are not usually discerned during the process of the trial; yet these are the most lasting and valuable. The obstacles which prevent us from rising with impulsive rapidity also conceal from us, at least to some extent, the wisdom of the arrangement. "Now, we see through a glass darkly; then, face to face."

"In the oldest and most venerable of all ecclesiastical divisions, the ancient Samaritan community, who have for centuries, without increase or diminution, gathered round Mount Gerizim as the only place where men ought to worship, there is to be read upon the aged parchment scroll of the Pentateuch this commandment added to the other ten: 'Thou shalt build an altar on Mount Gerizim, and there only shalt thou worship.' Faithfully have they followed that command; excommunicating and excommunicated by all other religious societies, they cling to that eleventh commandment, as equal if not superior to all the rest. This is the true likeness of what all churches and sects, unless purified by a higher spirit, are tempted to add."—Dean Stanley.

Never write on a subject without having first read yourself full on it; and never read on a subject till you have thought yourself hungry on it.—Richter.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at OXON HALL, St. Clair Street, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Cash Receipts for the week ending September 2nd.—J. W. Higgins, $2; Martin White, 25 cts.; E. H. Bingham, 50 cts.; Edmund R. Barnard, 25 cts.; M. H. Dersham, 10 cts.; James Riddle, 10 cts.; John F. Mills, $10.00; Henry K. Oliver, $20.00; H. L. Green, $1.50; Robert Moore, $10.00; Chas. T. How, $20.00; A. B. Seaborn, $1; James Richards, $1; C. W. Wadell, 50 cts.; R. H. Day, 10 cts.; M. Schlessinger, $10.00; L. T. Osborn, $10.00; Rev. R. H. Howard, 10 cts.; Jas. B. Thayer, 10 cts.; Marc Thane, 50 cts.; Silas P. Wood, 50 cts.; Wm. I. Bowditch, $20.00; Oscar Ross, $10.00; Annie P. Curtis, $2; Hannah P. Robinson, $2; Thos. W. Wright, $2; Laura M. Plimber, $1.50; G. L. Hopkins, $1; J. D. Welby, $2; R. H. Day, $1; Charles Skean, 5 cts.; E. G. Burnett, $4; Benj. Cobb, Jr., $2; E. G. H. Swanton, $2; Peter Lenk, $10.00; L. A. Foster, $2; Oscar Ross, $2; A. L. White, $2; J. B. Smith, $2; D. J. King, $10.00; F. A. Green, $10.00; E. S. Dunham, $20.00; Fitch Purdy, $1; Henry N. Stone, $10.00; ———, $10; Mrs. Mary Pracht, $10.00; Wm. Bismarck Pracht, $10; John Ordway, $1; Hugh Calderwood, 50 cts.; Dr. C. Martin, $2; C. C. Stearns, $5; Dr. J. F. Adams, $4; Theo. B. Owen, $10.00; C. W. Easterbrook, $10; B. Woodruff, $2; Wm. Madison, 50 cts.; Chas. Sullivan, 50 cts.; W. H. Siewart, 50 cts.; L. B. Williams, 50 cts.; L. O. Gray, 25 cts.; S. A. Oppell, 50 cts.; Quimby & Root, 50 cts.; A. Zimmerman, $1; L. Pelti, $1; J. R. Simmons, 50 cts.; J. N. Withersell, $1; W. J. McCall, $2.50; Walter Farnsworth, $2.50; Mathias Goddard, $2; W. G. Reiche, $2; A. E. Butts, $10.00; Folsom in trust, $20.00; W. F. Chesley, $2; Josiah Gooding, $2.50; M. Luce, $20.00; N. Cummings, $10.00; F. H. Benson, $10.00; W. C. Gannett, $20.00; Mrs. E. G. Wells, $10.00; Jno. Briggs, $5; B. B. Newhall, $10.00; E. R. Plynt, $2.75; H. L. Higgins, $2.50; A. K. Butts, $5; Samuel Rogers, 50 cts.; Jonathan Baker, 50 cts.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

N. B.—THE INDEX is payable in advance. Its friends should not be offended if the paper is stopped at the expiration of their terms as indicated by the mail tags. We have no means of knowing whether they wish it continued or not except by the receipt or non-receipt of the subscription price.

N. B.—Please examine the ADDRESS and DATE on your INDEX mail-tag, and report at once any error in either.

N. B.—If your INDEX mail-tag is not changed within three weeks after renewing your subscription, please notify us immediately. But do not write before the expiration of that time.

N. B.—Postage on THE INDEX is five cents per quarter, dating from receipt of the first number, payable in advance at the place of delivery.

N. B.—In case of any error in your mail tag, always state the post-office at which the paper is received, and also the name just as it is now printed. Then state any desired correction.

N. B.—Please remit by post-office money-order, by registered letter, or by draft on New York. Cheques on interior banks are liable to discount, and the term of subscription will be proportionally shortened in the credit.

N. B.—When writing about a former remittance, always give the date of such remittance as exactly as possible.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 26, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED elsewhere, Seven Hundred and Fifty				$75,000
JOHN J. STEPHENS, Oswego, N. Y.,	One	Share	100
C. D. B. MILLER, Syracuse, "	"	"	100
J. HENRY CLARK, "	"	"	100
E. B. WALDO, "	"	"	100
G. N. STEARNS, "	"	"	100
JOHN M. HICE, "	"	"	100
MARSHALL BROS., Minneapolis, Minn.,	"	"	100
S. LYDIARD, Long Lake, "	"	"	100
J. G. RICHARDSON, Lake City, "	Two	"	200
DR. D. K. BOUTELLE, "	One	"	100
R. E. GRISHAW, Minneapolis, Minn.,	"	"	100
Mrs. E. CROSBY, Portage City, Wis.,	"	"	100
Wm. H. ELLERY, Burlington, Iowa,	"	"	100
LYMAN T. OSBORN, Auburn, N. Y.,	"	"	100
P. C. TURNER, Albany, "	"	"	100
M. SCHLESINGER, "	"	"	100
JOSEPH KNIGHT, Troy, "	"	"	100
L. S. BRYANT, Dayton, Ohio,	"	"	100
L. F. GARDNER, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.,	"	"	100
J. C. CHATTEMENT, Rutherford Park, N. J.,	"	"	100
W. J. LEWIS, Ithaca, N. Y.,	"	"	100
HARVEY HARRIS, "	"	"	100
THEO. BROWN, Worcester, Mass.,	"	"	100
C. W. ESTERBROOK, "	"	"	100
E. B. LOMING, Boston, "	"	"	100
JUSTIN KIDGOUT, "	Five	"	500
A. FOLSON (in trust), "	Three	"	300
JOHN WETTERBERG, "	One	"	100
F. A. GREENE, "	"	"	100
E. S. DUNHAM, "	Two	"	200
N. COMMINGS, "	One	"	100
CHAS. T. HOW, "	Three	"	300
GEO. H. FOSTER, "	One	"	100
A. A. KNIGHT, "	"	"	100
GARDNER MURPHY, "	"	"	100
GEORGE HENSLAW, "	"	"	100
HENRY N. STONE, "	"	"	100
H. E. MANN, Fond du Lac, Wis.,	"	"	100
GODFREY GUNDERCK, Ionia, Mich.,	"	"	100
F. H. HENSHAW, Boston, Mass.,	One	"	100
W. C. GANNETT, "	Two	"	200
Mrs. K. G. WELLS, "	One	"	100
OSCAR KOOS, Taylor's Falls, Minn.,	"	"	100
				$82,700

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION:
CONDITIONAL STOCK LIST.

We, the undersigned, subscribers to the capital stock of the Index Association, agree to double our previous subscriptions to said stock on the same terms as before, taking respectively the additional number of shares set opposite to our names in the list below:

Provided, That the full sum of One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000) shall have been subscribed in good faith by the twenty-sixth day of October, 1872,—that is, within one year from the date when THE INDEX passed into the hands of the Index Association.

OF THE IRON ASSOCIATION.
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin, Pa.,	Five	Shares,	$500
CHAS. A. GURLEY,	Palisade, N. Y.,	Two	"	200
MAX PRACHT,	Cincinnati, Ohio,	"	"	200
J. N. LYMAN,	Columbus, "	One	"	100
WALTER F. AUSTIN,	Pittsburgh, Pa.,	Two	"	200
JAS. H. STONE,	Cincinnati, Ohio,	One	"	100
A. M. HOWLAND,	Boston, Mass.,	Five	"	500
				$1,800

NOTICE.

Attention is called to the revised advertisement of the publications of the Free Religious Association in another column. The back Annual Reports of the Association give in the best form the history of the organization, and contain addresses by Emerson, Phillips, Wesson, Welles, Higginson, Johnson, Frothingham, and others who have spoken on its platform. The Report for this year discusses some of the most living questions of the day. The friends of the Association cannot do a better service for it than by circulating these publications.

WM. J. POTTER,

Secretary.

Mr Towne has become editor of the College Courant, New Haven, Connecticut, and "hopes to raise it to a position of thoughtful, scholarly and sagacious representation of the higher interests of education and letters in this country." There is no doubt that he will achieve much in this direction, and do all that fine scholarship, high purpose, and indefatigable industry can do. We expect to see the Courant soon take its place among the few journals which no man or woman of thorough education can afford to neglect. Price of subscription, four dollars a year.

"This is God that is better than any name," said Hermes Trismegistus. Why, then, wonder that he is called by many names? Men may love in all languages.

The Index.

SEPTEMBER 28, 1872.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

N. B.—All letters, business or otherwise, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, Drawer 33, Toledo, Ohio."

ENLARGEMENT OF THE INDEX.

The necessity of taking definite action beforehand if the contemplated enlargement of THE INDEX is to be properly carried out, and the flattering prospect of soon completing the subscription of the required $100,000, justify the announcement at this early date that THE INDEX will be enlarged to sixteen pages at the commencement of its fourth volume, January 1, 1873. The size of the page will not be changed. It is yet too early to announce the various improvements and new features which, it is confidently expected, will characterize the paper after the above date: various plans are on foot which, if successful, cannot fail to command the approval of our subscribers, but it is unwise to discuss uncertainties. That we do not intend to sacrifice quality to quantity in doubling the amount of matter in THE INDEX, our readers may rest assured.

In order to meet the increased expenses involved by the change, it will be necessary to raise the yearly price of subscription from $2.00 to $3.00, commencing with the present issue. Those who have already paid their subscriptions will receive the enlarged paper during the full period for which they originally subscribed. All new subscribers, and all old subscribers who have not yet renewed, will receive it at the enhanced rates. But in order to make this increase of price as little burdensome as possible to our friends, we shall credit every one who sends to us $3.00 at any time between now and New Year with a full year's subscription from the first of January. That is, any subscriber, new or old, who remits $3.00 by the first of October will be credited with payment for fifteen months; whoever remits $3.00 by the first of November will be credited with payment for fourteen months; and so on. We thus offer a premium of three months subscription free to all those who will send us $3.00 at once; but this offer does not apply to those sending less than $3.00, whose term of subscription will be proportional to the amount remitted.

We trust that all our subscribers will be satisfied to receive one hundred per cent. more matter in THE INDEX for only fifty per cent. more money, and that all of them will take advantage of the liberal offer above explained. It is confidently believed that the enlargement of the paper will prove to be accompanied by a great increase of its general interest, influence, and power for good, and consequently involve a corresponding increase of its circulation at home and abroad. If our friends will but generously second our efforts with their own money and active co-operation, we venture to promise such a paper as shall multiply many times its present efficiency in the cause of Free Religion.

In connection with the above, we take great pleasure in announcing the appointment of Mr. Abram Walter Stevens, of Cambridge, Massachusetts, as associate editor and business agent in the conduct of THE INDEX. Mr. Stevens has already entered upon his new duties, which for the present will be chiefly in the latter capacity. Mr. P. H. Bateson, who has been business agent the past year, will still remain in the employ of the Index Association, and will also continue to print the paper in the same excellent style as heretofore.

We are also happy to announce that arrangements have been made with Mr. Asa K. Butts, of New York city, by which he will devote a large part of his time to acting as advertising and general agent for the Association. He has secured, and has already in the field, a corps of earnest and energetic assistants, such as Mr. Max Pracht, of Cincinnati, Mr. H. L. Green, of Syracuse, Mr. W. P. Wilson, late of Meadville, and others, who will give the greater part of their time to furthering the business interests of our enterprise. It is a cause for congratulation that the work of increasing the circulation of THE INDEX will henceforth be under the special direction of a gentleman so well qualified by business experience and skill, seconded by co-laborers whose great success in the past is the best guarantee of their future efficiency.

Meantime, to those who have furnished the pecuniary means to carry on our enterprise, and to all who in various ways have made it their own, we extend our most cordial thanks. Reminding them that the work is but just begun, we must add that all other agents and agencies combined will accomplish comparatively little without the continued co-operation of this great unselfish army of volunteers. To us as to them THE INDEX is only a means to an end—an instrumentality to be used in carrying out the great purpose of elevating to higher levels the mind and heart and spirit of our time. In the midst of our outward toil, it concerns us all to keep ever pure and bright the flame of that high inward consecration which alone can illumine the visible work of our hands. If in this spirit we all devote ourselves anew to the cause of "Liberty and Light," there is no danger that the low, sweet voice of truth shall be drowned in the clatter of multiplying machinery.

MR. A. W. STEVENS.

In the preceding article we have mentioned the appointment of Mr. A. W. Stevens as our associate in the work of editing THE INDEX. A few words of introduction seem due not only to him, but also to our readers; and even were it otherwise, we should find it difficult not to let a little of our own great satisfaction in the event leak into our columns.

Mr. Stevens, who is a native of Massachusetts, commenced his active life as editor of the Ledger, a radical political journal published in Warren, Pennsylvania, which remained under his charge from 1853 to 1855; and he edited the North American in Newark, Ohio, from 1855 to 1858. In both positions he manifested great energy and achieved great success; but, desiring to give himself to the work of the Unitarian ministry, he removed with his family in 1858 to Meadville, Pennsylvania, and was graduated there from the Unitarian Theological School in 1862. In the same year he was settled as minister of the Unitarian Society in Manchester, New Hampshire, remaining there three years, and in 1865 accepted a call from the Lee Street Unitarian Society of Cambridgeport, Massachusetts. His growing radicalism, however, and the fidelity with which he uttered his convictions as they matured, soon aroused the inevitable antagonism, and, although he was greatly beloved and warmly upheld by the majority of his society, he preferred at last, in 1870, to resign his position rather than to continue a contest characterized on the part of the minority by methods degrading to all concerned. During the next year, he was employed as principal proof-reader in the well-known printing establishment of John Wilson and Son, Cambridge, at the same time keeping up regular Sunday meetings of his radical friends in a private parlor. In the summer of 1871, he was appointed librarian of Harvard Law School, resigning this post to accept his present position on THE INDEX.

This is the mere shell of a career which we have watched with great respect and friendship from the time when Mr. Stevens was our fellow-student at Meadville. In most trying situations he has shown the qualities of a true man, and commands in a very rare degree the esteem of all who know him. Moreover, his early editorial experience, his practical knowledge of business, his strong and high-toned radicalism, his earnestness of spirit, weight of character, and well-trained mind, are precisely the qualities most needed for the duties that devolve upon him. It is a good augury for any cause when such men give themselves to it, and in such a spirit.

Next week we shall publish an essay by Mr. Stevens, entitled "The Seen and the Unseen."

"No indulgence of passion," says George MacDonald, "destroys the spiritual nature so much as respectable selfishness."

NECESSARY TRUTHS.

I have been reading Theophilus Parsons' little book called "The Infinite and the Finite,"—a very pleasant and profitable little book to read, the product of a devout and disciplined mind, equally free from timidity and from arrogance; a book written in the Swedenborgian faith, but not in any sectarian interest. It is as remarkable for the sweetness of its temper as for the earnest force of its statements. Mr. Parsons frankly assumes as the basis of his argument, two points—"that God made man, and made him to be immortal;" but back of these I find another assumption to which he thinks it necessary to call attention. He says: "The knowledge of God is the beginning of all knowledge concerning things which belong to man as immortal." Here seems to be the old familiar postulate, common to religious writers of every school, that a knowledge of God is essential to the highest attainment of humanity, the foundation of reason, the corner-stone of character. Starting from this point, the Romanist constructs the mighty fabric of his church, the Protestant develops the articles of his creed, the Transcendentalist unfolds the scheme of his spiritual philosophy. Mr. Parsons makes it the stepping-stone to his doctrines of the spiritual nature of man, the spiritual organism, revelation, immortality.

Such an assumption ought not to pass unchallenged, if only for the reason that it looks so natural and so innocent. The importance of truth is not to be called in question. It is of first moment that we should possess the truth as nearly as possible; that is, that we should understand our actual relations to the material world, our full responsibility to society, and the conditions under which our rational being obtains its complete satisfaction. Such knowledge is actually indispensable, and the pursuit of it is the loftiest duty and the sweetest privilege of an honorable mind. But to say this is very different from saying that any particular article or statement or so-called "first principle" is indispensable. It would seem as if the knowledge of God, as being the final term of knowledge, and implying a multitude of knowledges in different departments, should come at the end of the search rather than at the beginning. Is it really meant that nothing can be known respecting the universe we live in, nothing respecting the rules of noble life, the laws of humanity, the intellectual and moral capacities, the lines and limits of progress, until this one article of knowledge is obtained? Is it really believed that the powerful action of any human faculty is conditioned by the possession of this particular point of faith? Perhaps the implication is that without it men cannot be happy or good, high-minded or pure, strong-hearted or aspiring. But such an opinion does not look reasonable to those who consider the store of inducements and motives, the quite immeasurable supply of lures and goads laid up in the mind and placed within easy reach at every turn of experience. Even the fine qualities that make immortality probable or desirable may be called into being and stimulated to rich growth by the natural discipline of human existence, in persons who regard the knowledge of God as a thing unattainable. Certainly there are examples of good men and women claiming no such knowledge, yet leading noble lives, enough to prove that its presence is not indispensable or its absence fatal to the sweetest graces of character. The value of such a knowledge or of a faith practically equivalent to it need not be doubted; its deep importance to very many people who have but little knowledge of other sorts may be appreciated; but this is not to affirm its indispensableness as a first principle of thought in the employment of the highest reason.

Mr. Parsons' assumption belongs to that theological region which is gradually becoming remote and unsubstantial, like some cloudland rolling away and disclosing green fields for pasture and tillage beneath. So long as the assumption is countenanced, encouragement is given to the bewildering influences that flow from it, to perverse methods of reasoning, and to arbitrary conclusions propounded by dogmatism and enforced by authority. In the short space of one hundred and eighty-six duodecimo pages, Mr. Parsons, starting gently from this innocent cardinal idea, proceeds great lengths in the theological direction, landing in certain most positive conclusions which minds less gentle than his own erect into hostile forts bristling with cannon. This is the inevitable premise of sectarianism, an evil of such magnitude and acridity as to render suspicious even an angel that pointed a shining finger towards it. In these high speculations, all appearance of assumption had better be discarded. To speak of "knowledge" is immodest. If anything is to be assumed, let it be the supreme importance of all truth, and the ability of the reason to find it, piece by piece, by such means as are put within its reach. To know relations and conditions is something; how much they understand, who have made them a study and felt the vitality that even a slight understanding of them imparts!

O. B. F.

RADICALISM IN ENGLAND.

An American radical is at once struck by the contradiction of English ways in respect to the form and the substance of Christian belief. The form meets him everywhere more conspicuously than here. The distribution of tracts is more abundant: I had them given to me by fellow-passengers on railway trains,—merchants, for instance, and army officers. The display of printed texts of Scripture at railway stations is very noticeable, and I was told that some societies for this purpose were so richly endowed that they could hardly spend their income. At the table d'hôte of hotels, I have several times seen the guests called to order by the head waiter, with a loud knock on the table from a knife-handle; after which some gentlemen, not in any case a clergyman, asked a blessing. I hardly ever saw this done at a miscellaneous hotel in America.

On the other hand, it was lately asserted by Lord Shaftesbury, at a meeting of the Christian Evidence Society, that in England, "bishops, deans, men of science, the greatest minds in literature, all avowed infidel principles. It was difficult, in fact, to find a man under the age of forty who would confess to a belief in anything at all." It certainly seemed to me that there was, among the educated men whom I met, a more visible rejection or ignoring of what are commonly classed as Christian doctrines, even in the most general sense, than among a similar class in the United States. I am not now speaking of special students of theology, but of literary men and journalists, as well as men of science. The Christian doctrines seemed to be in a manner ignored and set aside, as having lost their hold upon the educated mind. The clergy themselves, while enjoying more outward dignity than here, seemed to be more separated from the common life of intellectual laborers, and to be mentioned more slightly by such. In short, their position in England seemed to have taken a long step toward that peculiar mingling of outward deference and half-concealed contempt, which one observes in case of the clergy in a Roman Catholic country.

It is to be observed that the very men who lead this body of advanced liberalism are willing to identify themselves distinctly with usages in which they have no faith. At church, I heard the responses devoutly made by highly cultivated men who showed by their whispered remarks in the intervals how little reality it had to them. It seemed to me that my non-responding was more reverential than their responses. Voysey preaches in a surplice. Huxley had his children baptized, and Tyndall mentions the fact as meritorious. In America, I think that these things would hardly be done by persons professing such opinions; nor would society care to ask whether they did such things or not.

I do not know whether it is a consequence of this sort of conformity, but I found among this class in England glimpses of a sort of perplexity about the religious education of children, that we do not find among radicals here. Having come to our position, as most of us have, by a route which the words "Free Religion" indicate, we see no difficulty in bringing up children, as we ourselves were perhaps trained, to recognize the voice of conscience and the spirit of reverence, apart from all special Christian creed. But, in England, I heard men of science frankly recognizing that women and children, at least, needed something in the way of Sunday-school, or technical Christian instruction, were it only to bridge the interval between the church of this generation and the pure science of the next. This seemingly inconsistent solicitude seems to me to proceed partly from the influence of an established church, and partly, also, from the undue development of the scientific side of English thought. Except in Tyndall, who knows Emerson's process by heart and acknowledges him as his greatest teacher, there is a want of development of the ideal and intuitive faculties, it seems to me, among the scientific leaders of England. But they are doing magnificently their special work; and it is hardly fair to claim that Newton should be also Milton, or Huxley Browning.

T. W. H.

THE SUICIDE OF THE CHURCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—Your readers, no doubt, at times, have their mischievous moods, in which the love of destruction excites their ingenuity. It is possible that when they take a survey of Orthodox churches around them, and observe the many failings which outweigh the benefits of such institutions, a desire to see them swept from the face of the earth may take possession of their heart.

If I may venture to give advice on such a matter, I would say to pugnacious and revolutionary enemies of Churches, "Let them alone. Give them time, and they will work their own dissolution."

The problem—"how to pull down a church"—has been answered lately here in England, in a remarkable and an authoritative manner. We have a prelate amongst us, as you know, who is the apostle of expediency and worldly wisdom; a man who prides himself upon his cunning, and who is admired and rewarded for his tact. But like Achitophel of old, Bishop Wilberforce now and then makes a frightful blunder, and by overdoing his part exposes his own hollowness.

One of those very silly young Ritualist clergymen, the other day, kissed his robe in presence of the congregation, whereupon Bishop Wilberforce immediately withdrew the young man's license. Of course, antics of this kind are worthy of reproof; but the punishment inflicted by the Bishop was unduly severe. It was, however, intended as a master-stroke of policy to make-believe how he hated Ritualistic follies. Those who know His Worship's devotion to sacerdotalism are not so easily taken in by such demonstrations.

Episcopal tyranny was again manifested by this shrewd Bishop in a way which most people will consider a mistake in policy. A curate in his diocese performed a marriage strictly according to the law of the land, between a man and a divorced woman; whereupon the Bishop inhibits the curate from taking any duty within the limits of his jurisdiction. I should explain to your readers that this is tantamount to being ruined for life, because of the "Trade-Unionism" among the bishops. None of them will ever license a clergyman who has been prohibited from another diocese. Episcopal tyranny over unbeneficed clergymen is in dreadful activity and decidedly on the increase. But the Bishop forgot that it is only an exhibition of cowardice and weakness to visit with the utmost severity the transgressions of a poor curate, while they leave the rector vicars to do as they please. The world is watching their tactics, and the verdict is, "They are undermining the church."

My next illustration is more striking still, as a sign of the times. It is a case not of Episcopal tyranny, but of archiepiscopal arrogance. One is more distressed at it, as coming from such a good-hearted man as Archbishop Tait, than if it had been from the tongue of that arch-bigot, Bishop Wilberforce.

Addressing a meeting of the "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," the Archbishop of Canterbury is reported to have said, after enumerating several classes of "heathens" who congregate in London: "In our metropolis we are brought so near heathenism of the worst class, that, unless we take some steps for the converting of the heathen, the heathen will be converting us." Such words, taken in connection with a specific reference to those gentlemanly and cultured Hindus who are now adorning our learned professions, were little less than an insult to those strangers who are endeavoring to share the highest privileges of our advance in science.

It made me flush with shame to read such words in the Times, and to think how they would wound the sensibilities of my honored friend, Babu Chunder Sen, in India, and his cousins who are now in London, and who attend our services at St. George's Hall. Other Hindu gentlemen I have had the pleasure of meeting who deserve and receive the utmost respect from the most cultured class in our country; and they too must have been ashamed of England and simply disgusted with its Christianity, when the Primate was moved on religious grounds to treat them with this unseemly and undignified scorn.

How a fine old Scotch gentleman could be brought down so far below the level of his order,—to say nothing of an Archbishop degrading his office,—is only to be explained by that sweet and humane "gospel" about which Christians vaunt themselves, and which they are so anxious to "propagate" in "foreign parts." We know the tree by its fruits; and the Archbishop's words are only the echo of the spirit of the Athanasian creed and much that is to be found in Apostolic Epistles. He is so far a credit to Christianity; and those of degenerate taste like myself, who do not consider the religion of Christendom to be altogether lovely, are very well content to be called "heathens," lest our religion be confounded with the "Christianity" which teaches to insult the stranger that sojourneth among us.

Already, two stinging replies have been printed in the Times, coming from these "heathens of the worst class;" and the wonder is, not that the letters should betray so much literary power, but that they should be so comparatively free from that revengeful temper which we impertinent Europeans designate as "Oriental."

The Examiner has a verse on the occasion which I must quote for your amusement:—

"Zeal, without knowledge and over-hot,
Into a bubble his Grace has got.
Better to pander—discreeter too—
And copy the drawing of mild Hindu."

Taking these little stories together, I think my advice at the beginning of this letter is well-grounded. Surely, nothing could be devised for the speedy overthrow of the Church of England more fatal than the bad policy of Bishop Wilberforce, and the "Christian" contempt of upright and cultured foreigners exhibited by Archbishop Tait.

But we must temper our judgment with pity; perhaps, if these prelates had been brought up "heathens," they would have shown more humanity.

I am, sir, very sincerely yours,
CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE, DULWICH,
LONDON, S. E., August 24, 1872.

P. S., August 27.—In yesterday's Times appears a letter from the Bishop of Carlisle, endeavoring to exonerate the Archbishop of Canterbury from any intention to wound the feelings of the Hindu and other "heathen" gentlemen by whom we are surrounded. It would have been more satisfactory had the letter proceeded from the Archbishop himself. But it is manifest that the fine gentlemanly soul of His Grace was for the moment eclipsed by his "Christian" sentiment, and no more to blame than we are when we feel a chill at sunset.

"A Buffalo clergyman sent around the contribution boxes for the dear heathen, and collected sixty cents, ten cents of which was in soda-water checks. $80,000 were offered in purses for the races which took place there last week."

The sixty cents also were contributed to help on a race—the race between Protestant and Catholic Christianity for the empire of the world. It is well that no more money was wasted on this most profitless race of all.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.
N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

GRATZ BROWN AND THE CHRISTIAN AMENDMENT.

STATE OF MISSOURI,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
CITY OF JEFFERSON, July 9, 1872.
E. R. BROWN, AND OTHERS,
ELMWOOD, ILL.

Gentlemen,—Governor Brown directs me to reply to your favor of the 27th ult., in which you ask whether an attempt to "secure a theological Amendment to the United States Constitution" would meet with his approval, and to state that he is not in favor of anything of the kind.

Very respectfully,
F. N. JUDSON,
Private Secretary.

[Mr. E. R. Brown has kindly complied with our request for a copy of the above letter for publication, and we desire to return him our thanks for it. Many of our readers will be glad to know that Governor Brown no longer gives in his adhesion to the Christian Amendment scheme.—ED.]

"LET US ALL UNITE IN PRAYER."

The writer in the Contemporary Review who proposes to believers in prayer to join during three or five years in offering petitions for the diminution of disease or the recovery of patients in a single selected ward of a hospital, to the end that a quantitative measurement may be made of God's accessibility to prayer, has drawn upon himself much severe, and it would seem unmerited, censure.

The London Spectator, for instance, after stigmatizing the proposal as one "to be spoken of with reluctance and disgust," proceeds to say:—

"We will justify the line we have taken about this insidious challenge, by stating why the author's proposal seems to us a covert sneer, and not the frank challenge of a cultivated inquirer. What Christians for the most part believe is that God makes a real answer to prayer; whether in the way of pitiful denial, of tender assent, or assent in some deeper sense than that of the request itself, which is manifest to the heart of him who offered it. Suppose you pray for the recovery of a mortally sick friend who dies. What your prayer really consists of is the confession of the blank you fear for yourself and others, the dread of losing moral helps and sympathy, the yearning that this trouble may not come upon those whom it threatens. And the prayer is as much answered by the substitution of other and perhaps more potent influences, as by the recovery of the threatened life itself."

Is this a fair statement? Is it what Christians "for the most part" believe? Perhaps so. But it is not what is read from our Bibles, preached from our pulpits, taught in our Sunday-schools, enjoined at our mother's knee, inculcated in our religious periodicals. Hundreds of Scripture texts and narratives represent prayer as the one all-powerful engine for the procuring of blessings temporal and spiritual. The Fathers of the early church testify to marvellous acts performed by the help of prayer. And in our own day, have we not the heathen woman's school in Syria, which a Christian school in America made one summer a special subject of prayer, with the result—as it would seem—that in that one summer five-sixths of the pupils became converts to the Christian faith? What shall we say of the German Prayer-Cure? What of George Müller and his prayer-fed institution? What of the elegant church in Philadelphia, opened every Thursday morning to a woman preacher, whose audiences number from three to five hundred, and whose especial theme is prayer and its power to sway the hand that sways the universe? What becomes of the Tract Society's stories of pious widows with large families, whose agonizing petitions for help against impending starvation are almost sure to be interrupted by the arrival of men with potatoes?

No; the common theory of prayer is no such transcendental thing as the critic describes. When a man prays for the recovery of his sick child, it is his child's life he wants and asks for. No doubt the higher the spiritual attainment he has made, the more truly he tries to feel submissive to the order of events, call it by what name we will. Yet not the less does he crave and ask for the specific boon of his child's life. When a congregation join in prayer for rain, they mean rain, not "the more potent moral influence" that might come from a drouth. They are told that God sends rain at his pleasure, and shall they not ask for it when their fields are scorching? Let the issue be fairly met.

It is impossible, even with due allowance made for well-intentioned romancing, not to admit the truth of very many instances of "Remarkable Answers to Prayer." A man who searches for them through history will find them in abundance. Is it necessary then to attribute them to an arbitrary Being who gives or withholds at his own mere will and pleasure? Not at all.

What is more reasonable than to suppose that outside our ken are higher intelligences, perhaps once dwellers upon earth, whose knowledge of the laws which govern cause and effect far surpasses ours, and with whom we may be brought into relations by the outgoing of the strong, fervent, concentrated desire of the heart? Spirits in the form we know are all the time accomplishing things once deemed impossible, even contrary to natural law. And is it so incredible that progress is being made by spirits out of the form also, or that by their larger light they may, when right conditions are granted, assist our ignorance? There is nothing in this to preclude the belief in a Supreme Power who is the author and sustainer of all law.

I believe with Mr. Abbot that the proposal of Mr. Tyndall's friend is one "eminently fit to be made" and tried. I believe that by tests of this character light would be thrown upon certain occult yet perfectly harmonious laws, which are now but dimly guessed at. And I believe that no one is doing half so much to elucidate these laws as the very materialistic philosophers who deny immortality, yet who in studying to find "the mechanical equivalent of consciousness," and in carrying out the refinements of matter to their last extent, are year by year coming nearer to the great secret.

H. L. B. B.

ANSWERS TO PRAYER.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

Permit me to say that the proposition in regard to answers to prayer, so much debated of late, involves conditions utterly repugnant to the very genius of prayer. True prayer is utterly uncalculating. It is heart-born; it is born of sympathies, of an earnestness, of a faith far underlying volition. A man may say his prayers. Admit that there is a vast amount of formal praying—sincere, trusting, yet in a measure formal, inasmuch as it is not inspired by the highest kind of earnestness. No man can truly pray in the business-like way in which you would ring a gentleman's door-bell, or summon a waiter at a public table. No true Christian could truly pray for one sick man, and utterly neglect another lying right along side. He has never been encouraged to believe any such prayer would be answered. It is precisely here that the back of your proposition breaks.

Again, not only is this "so-called scientific spirit" utterly repugnant to the spirit of prayer, as it is to all spiritual or highly emotional states, but, as you yourself frankly admit, even if the experiment were to be never so successful and the demonstration complete, no such effect would be produced by the same upon the sceptic's mind as the undertaking, if attempted, would contemplate. "Scientists" would simply say, you intimate, "We have discovered a new remedial agent. Henceforth hospitals must be supplied with praying bands." Others doubtless would still carp as now, "If they could by praying raise up fifty per cent. of the sick, why not the whole? Evidently the whole thing is a humbug, and a delusion."

You say that, whatever the evident success of prayer, you scientists must be left to draw your own inferences. This statement certainly has a very fair look; and yet, if I may venture to judge of its animus, its meaning is really this: whatever the answer to our prayers, your mind is made up in advance not, under any circumstances, to be convinced of the supernatural; in other words, that God actually, directly, answers prayer.

Now permit me to say that, whatever becomes of you and me, Christians can never offer such prayers; and, even if they could, God would never honor or answer prayers for the purpose of gratifying any such temper. Jesus never did. None of the wonderful works ascribed to him were wrought to gratify any idle curiosity, to satisfy a purely captious spirit, or merely to make sick people comfortable. They were wrought to honor the faith of the supplicant; wrought in the interest of moral truth; wrought to open up, so to speak, the right of way through dark minds for his spiritual kingdom. Persons who are bound to be captious must take it out in that. Such never did, never will, obtain any satisfaction from Jesus. Their cavils will never command any attention.

And yet may not the physical effects of prayer be calculated? Certainly. How? By considering the effects of one prayer—of prayer offered, not "under the gaze of science" (Nature never waits to operate in that way, for the express purpose of making a public exhibition of herself), but under appropriate and necessary conditions. Well authenticated instances of answers to such prayers abound. Let science tackle them.

R. H. HOWARD.

CURSORY THOUGHTS ON LIFE.

The age is dealing with great problems. It demands upon man and woman are equal. We should be proud that we are destined to labor in it. That we may be worthy of our exalted calling, let us endeavor to place ourselves in sympathy with the intense intellectuality that is throbbing around us, and to realize what an earnest, grand thing it is to live.

Life should consist in the fulfillment of possibilities, in high attainment, and wealth of experience. It should not be looked at in the voluptuous glow of epicureanism or in the gloomy light of monasticism. We should live broadly, be cosmopolitan, recognize the brotherhood of the race, the rights of the individual; allow no creeds, dogmas, class or national prejudice to dwarf us. Be not only thorough in your scholarship, rich in the accumulated wisdom of the centuries, but be, above all, deep searching and fearless in your thoughts, devoted to principles, not persons. Our living should be characterized by dignity, chivalric sense of honor, love for truth and humanity—detestation of shame, superstitious and wrongs—preferring death to the surrender of principle. "Bury your dead joys, and live above them with the living world."

Live in the day. Be concerned about the varied interests of the present. If you do well your part in time, why dread eternity? Do right for right's sake. The work of the hour belongs more to the schools than to the churches. The times demand not fasting and prayer, but greater strength brought into life. More than priests we need statesmen, scientists, philosophers, and men of enterprise. We want those who will utilize the forces about us, and aid us to larger living.

Amidst the materialism of the period, it would be well not to forget that the annals of history are radiant with deeds of splendid daring and lofty endurance, achieved by men and women of courtly elegance, in loyalty to sovereign, country, or love. Then let our living be not only wise, deep, and strong, but also fragrant with enthusiasm for all that is beautiful in nature or art. May our bearing be marked by refinement, grace, and courtesy! Be at ease in legislative assemblies, learned halls, or the brilliant gatherings of palaces. It is said of Sir Philip Sidney that he was the "beau idéal of the courtier, the soldier, the scholar." In your ascent to noble manhood and womanhood, in your struggle to stand a peer among earth's best, remember that—

"The grave flowers that wreath the sword
Make not the blade less strong."

M.

THE POSITION OF WOMEN, AND THEIR FUTURE.

BY A WOMAN.

The sober and temperate character of THE INDEX will give weight to the subject of our sketch as many other papers cannot, whose extravagances of speech are the natural result of extravagant suppositions; and, though not a professed champion of this reform, yet who can doubt that THE INDEX, from the very nature of its position in its own field of labor, sustains all that the true advocates of woman's rights have ever claimed?

The reform in religious beliefs, which mainly consists in supplanting the old theology with a newer and more rational one, takes up, like drift-wood, all other reforms of whatever nature. Involved in this reform known as the woman reform, is the ideal justice, which is God himself. The half-justice that is sought for is only a fragment of the pure, perfect, and all-encompassing justice of God. This heart-throb which all women who have not felt will feel, this awakening and expansion of the world's thought, is a part of the beautiful unfolding of the human race. From Aspasia to our own Margaret Fuller and, a score of years later, the brilliant women advocating the very same idea of the enlargement of the sphere of happiness and usefulness for the sex,—this reform, allied to all reforms by the primal law of truth, slowly grows from ignorance into discovery and knowledge.

The heaven, then, has been working for ages; and the Anna Dickinsons and Mrs. Stantons of to-day, who hold their audiences by the magic spell of eloquence, their feet firmly planted in pulpits and rostrums where Paul once forbade them to stand, are the result of what was fated to come,—of what no amount of Bible legislation or any legislation could repress. The sweet charities of the soul, the love-nature of the woman, the patience of the mother, the gentleness, the fine sensibilities, the physical feebleness and delicacy which make out-door toil alien to her nature, will remain just as they are; for nothing outside can change the self-hood of any creature. Here and there one may turn aside and pervert her nature to beliefs and practices which degrade true womanly feeling and natural delicacy of body and mind; but it is through them that odium comes which retards for a time the purest and truest success of the reform. It is no advantage to the reform when people flock by the thousands to hear Mrs. Woodhull at Steiway Hall; her sacrifice, bordering upon insanity, of every sentiment holiest in woman to the desire for notoriety, and her ambition to be regarded as the social heroine, the leader of a party, the seer and prophet, totally checked for a time the public opinion that was rapidly developing. It is only surprising that her fatal self-love did not sooner sink her into obscurity.

The opinion here expressed of Mrs. Woodhull comes from no bias of personal prejudice. She is known to the writer only through her public utterances, and the report of some who know her. The good she has done will clear itself from inconsistencies and error in time; and what truth she has spoken will live.

The need that women, as well as men, should become in future identified with the great humanitarian movements of the time is more and more felt; and the new régime in some of our colleges and universities places this beyond a peradventure. Strong, healthy minds in sound bodies, be the latter never so fair, "molded in exquisite grace," are perfectly compatible with patriotism and public spirit. Among the swarm of critics who are "afraid," and from behind their screen of inanities say very softly, "I don't pretend to be strong-minded or to know anything of political affairs," there is not one, perhaps, who would not be proud, were she numbered with the brilliant coterie who are at this very hour actively engaged both in speaking and writing! Many women rank respectably with journalists, reporters, writers of fiction, and even orators of the other sex; and all this is the result of a reform which has been opposed at every step by both sexes. But the more positive discouragement came through their own sex. Passion, frenzied appeals, misguided enthusiasm, thrust in their weapons slaying both friends and foes for a time,—dispassionate women looking on saddened but not discouraged.

But this turbid stream seems gradually working itself clear; the unbelieving and ignorant talk less and think more. Impetuosity is not a healthy force; intensity of feeling is baneful when there is not intellect sufficient to force it into beneficent channels. The semi-barbarity of society is, perhaps, largely owing to this class of persons whom feeling unduly sways. There is but one way: intellect must become master; the head must rule, and not the heart.

And will the repression of feeling, or the subordination of sentiment to a larger intellectual life, detract from the loveliness of the woman? Not the ideal woman of a generation or two to come. Mere animal beauty, the "pink and white," the "doll-faced," has been the saint at whose shrine all writers of fiction have bowed and worshipped; but physical beauty fades before the true beauty of mind and soul which has an eternity to unfold in.

C. A. B.

ORTHODOX PRAYER—SHORT FORM.

"O Lord God, I am better than thou art. I have the will to save the world, but not the power. Thou hast the power, but not the will. Let me importune thee to join thy power with my will, and let us save poor, perishing mortals from the pangs of eternal condemnation."

O.

AN INFIDEL VIEW OF CATHOLICISM.

[Correspondence of the Catholic Review.]

The Westminster Review, the famous Infidel Quarterly, has a remarkable article in its July number, headed "Dr. Newman and the difficulties of Protestantism." I do not know whether you have among your readers any who are so unhappy as to be infidels, but no doubt many Protestants read your columns, and to them I commend this passage from the article in question. It may come to them with more force as the utterances of one who looks at the question discussed from a wholly independent point of view.

"In a well-known passage of his essays, Lord Macaulay has remarked that it is by no means sure that Roman Catholicism may not be destined to outlive all other ecclesiastical establishments in the world. We think that it is at any rate destined to outlive the system known as Protestantism. . . . Roman Catholicism is a system very logically reasoned out from certain premises. These, it is true, are only assumptions, but they are assumptions in a great degree common to itself and its reforming opponents. Whatever may be thought of its axioms and postulates, its propositions do result from them. Protestantism on the other hand, with far better foundations laid for its edifice, finds itself unable to build in any direction but one, without the risk of seeing the structure crumble into pieces on the heads of the builders. The corner-stone is an admirable one for a temple of free thought, and for nothing else. Granting that God Almighty came upon the earth to found a religious system, we are at a loss to make out where such a system is to be found, if not in the Church of Rome. Granting the right of free judgment as applied to the Bible, we are equally at a loss to understand how any one can be called upon to believe in the inspiration of the Bible; or in the event of his doing so, to what part of it he is to be referred for the distinctive tenets of Protestantism. The great achievement of the Reformation was the establishment of the right of private judgment, as opposed to the dogma of an infallible church. Nothing, to our way of thinking, can be more alien to reason, than the idea of a divine revelation of essential truths, from which a dozen conflicting systems can be extracted. Nothing would be more bewildering to our minds (if, to be sure, habit had not accustomed us to the notion) than the idea of God, one of the Trinity, appearing on the earth for a few years, and leaving behind him, so to speak, nothing but a bundle of documents, often contradicting each other, nowhere asserting their own infallibility, and from which not even the dogma of his own divinity, much less that of the Trinity, is clearly to be proved. . . . We have spoken of the right of private judgment as the outcome of the Reformation; but of course, as every one knows, a compromise was adopted. The compromise was to this effect, that every one was perfectly free to exercise his judgment in religious matters, subject to the proviso, that in point of fact he was not free to do any thing of the kind. He must believe in the infallibility of certain writings, and, moreover, he must consent to see certain dogmas and no others inculcated in these writings. These dogmas varied slightly in different regions; but there was for a long while a general agreement or undertaking in Protestant countries to burn all those who persisted in seeing the Real Presence in Scripture, or who stumbled in the matter of the Godhead of the Son, or of the Trinity; while persons who denied that paedobaptism is to be found in the New Testament, and minor offenders of that description, were allowed to rot lazily in gaols."

PHILIP GOULD, THE COLORED HERO.—While the leading journals have been giving eager comments on the Stokes matter, the trial of a fast young man for the murder of a reckless speculator in behalf of a wanton woman, there is another story, which they pass by in silence, of a young man who last week did what he could for woman, too, though in a different manner, possessing neither gold nor stocks nor romantic naivete, which seems to us worth telling. A party of excursionists had gone from Philadelphia to Norristown, and just before dark gathered about a station called Spring Mill, in order to return home. The track at this point has a sharp curve with a bank on one side and a declivity on the other. Five of the women were standing on the track when the whistle of the approaching express train was heard coming around the curve not twenty yards from them. They thought it was the train on the other side of the river which was just passing, and did not move. The next instant the express came along. They shrunk back in terror, but a young man standing on the bank fearlessly jumped in front of the engine and thrusts the women, one after another, down the embankment into safety, and then is caught up and dashed at their feet—dead.

We hope the story of this young man who died so manfully will be treasured, because it is an ennobling example to us all. Praise cannot benefit him now, nor give comfort to those he left behind him. We believe, too, that the most cheering circumstance of the story is the fact that such men are common among us. There is not a railroad accident of any kind which does not bring to light deeds of heroism that stir the pulses and bring tears to the eyes. We thank God for such men as this gallant lad. We do not mourn Cour de Lion dead because we know there are hundreds living, as brave and gallant knights as he.—Milwaukee Evening Wisconsin.

THE JESUITS FEW BUT STRONG.—According to the "Catalogus Societatis Jesu pro 1871," published at Vienna, there are 8,809 Jesuits in the twenty-two provinces of the order. The largest number, 744, were in the province of Castile, Spain; next followed Germany with 738, and Austria and Hungary with 451. It would seem singular that the German Government should take such vigorous steps against so small a body of men. But it should be borne in mind that the Jesuits control the policy of the leading prelates and priests of the Catholic church since 1870.

Now there are in Germany upwards of eighteen thousand Catholic priests, and eleven thousand other persons holding offices under the Church. If to them be added the pupils of the seminaries and the nuns in the convents, it will be found that the Jesuits in Germany are at the head of an army of fifty thousand ecclesiastics. In Westphalia every fortieth person is an ecclesiastic; in Paderborn every tenth, and in Munster every twentieth.

According to the new law of the German empire, all convents and nunneries that have been under the control of the Jesuits are to be closed in six months, and the ecclesiastics will be ordered to leave the country.—Milwaukee Evening Wisconsin.

That was a very touching incident—that of the little school girl who refused to define the word clown as "a low, vulgar fellow," and for her stubbornness was punished with the ferule, and detained in play hours, all to no reformatory end. The little child's father proved to be a clown in the circus.

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, OCTOBER 5, 1872.

WHOLE No. 145.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonise it with the Bible. It recognises no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilised world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussion on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ARBOTH, Editor.
ABRAHAM WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS BROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HINGENOM, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, ROY. CHARLES VOTSEY (England), PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), ROY. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

The Seen and the Unseen.

BY A. W. STEVENS.

Paul was the author of a fine saying when he wrote to the Corinthians, "The things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are unseen are eternal." The sturdy apostle sounded deeper depths of thought with that verbal plummet than perhaps he himself was aware. He hit upon the profoundest question that has exercised and divided into different schools of philosophy the wisest men who have lived.

And who, upon reflection, will not say that a most beautiful though subtle truth is in these words of Paul,—a truth that the many do not think of, and that the few think of none too much. In fact, most men live as though they believe the reverse of this maxim to be true,—that the things which are unseen are temporal, and the things which are seen are eternal. In this they would appear to be practical if not theoretical materialists, declaring by their actions, pursuits, and aims that they assume the permanency and reality only of those things which are apparent,—which are palpable, tangible, and apprehensible to the senses,—dismissing those which are beyond sensible sight, hearing, and touch to the realm of all that is vague, misty, and doubtful.

The materialist, whether practical or theoretical, stands upon the firm earth and solid rock; he sees huge mountains reared aloft, resting upon unmoved foundations; he beholds forests of timber, piles of brick, blocks of granite fashioned into high and massive walls, and forming together the fortified habitations of great towns and cities; he hears the whirl and clank of heavy machinery, the hum and tramp of human industry; he notes the towering masts, the ponderous hulls, the broad sails, and immense merchandise of commerce; he sinks his shaft into deep mines of minerals, and lays open to his view great treasures of coal, iron, silver, and gold; he collects around him his own personal possessions, and marks their quantity and quality;—his senses take cognizance of these and other contents of the material world, and he says, with an air and feeling of confidence if not of positive assurance, "These are the realities of existence; these are permanent and reliable: I believe in these because I can see and feel them, these exist in fact; but all else which my senses cannot discover,—which is impalpable, intangible, imponderable,—how can I believe in it? since to me it does not appear to be, except in speculation and in name." In short, the materialist says, "I cannot but believe in the reality and permanency of things which are seen; and I cannot but be slow to believe in the reality and permanency of those which are unseen."

I would, therefore, in this essay, seek to bring into prominence, and touch with as much emphasis as I may, the sublime truth hinted at by Paul; and try to illustrate the relative reality and durability of the material and the spiritual, of the concrete and the abstract, of things which are seen and things which are unseen.

We will assume at this point that there are two ultimate realities in the universe,—force and matter. Force is that which produces; matter is that which is produced. Force creates, shapes, alters; matter is created, shaped, altered. In appearance, at least, these are two and also vastly different realities. Whether in the last analysis they are essentially one has not yet been demonstrated, perhaps never will be. Phenomenally they are unlike; and they appear to us as the greater and the less, the master and the subject, the agent and the patient, the doer and the thing done. How can it but be that that which produces is anterior to that which is produced? The cause necessarily precedes the effect. The cause also is more vital than the effect: it antedates, underlies, and outlasts the effect. It comes, passes, and returns, driving the effect before it; saying to it, Appear, change, vanish! But while the effect vanishes, the cause remains, and poses itself for a new result. The effect we can conceive both as existing and non-existing. The cause, whatever it is, is necessarily existent: that we cannot conceive as non-existing.

Now, that which we see and touch—that which our senses recognize—is the effect. The cause is beyond outward detection. It is too deep for the plummet of sense to sound, too high for its feet to climb, too subtle for its apprehension to grasp. "No man hath seen God at any time." What a profound significance is in these words!

The seen, therefore, is the temporal. To-day it exists; yesterday it did not; to-morrow it may not. But the unseen—fleeter than the winds, higher than the heavens, deeper than the earth—is eternal. Force, if we call it force, is everlasting. Or if we call it mind, spirit, God, it is everlasting.

We might assume, then, without departing from the apparent truth, that there is but one ultimate reality in the universe,—Force, or Mind, or God. All else is phenomenal, fleeting, unstable. This alone seems real and durable; and, though incapable of being tracked to its hiding place, it exists from all eternity. From everlasting to everlasting it is. What we call matter would appear to have no identical, durable existence. So far as we can discover, it contains no self-originating power. When we arrive at where it seems to begin, we find something else, something more, which gave it its first push, its first impulse towards existence, towards appearance. And now we see it, and now again we do not, according as this antecedent, vital power causes it to approach or recede, appear or vanish.

This, indeed, is the result of the investigations which science makes. From no quarter have we stronger testimony to the mutability of material things than from the closet, the laboratory of science, where matter is pursued to that point at which it vanishes into breath, and melts into the bosom of the unknown.

Science indicates that the whole outward universe is phenomenal and transient; that it exists as the visible manifestation and form of what is in itself invisible,—the invisible being the cause, the visible the outward product and effect. As the cause wills or motions, the effect appears; as the cause withdraws, the effect vanishes.

For instance, this earth, upon which the materialist treads with so much confidence in its firmness and durability, science says is a something composed of fine, microscopic particles, perfectly helpless and powerless to themselves, being controlled and held together by a subtle and wholly invisible force called gravitation, about which we know nothing more certain than that if it were to withdraw itself for an instant this entire material fabric, on which we so calmly and assuredly repose, would vanish into air. It declares that these lofty mountains resting on their granite beds, these huge rocks so massive as seemingly to be impenetrable to any disturbing power, these mines of metals packed in solid strata in the earth,—all these, and every particle of matter connected with our globe, were, not countless ages gone, an oozy and a liquid mass, pliant then as even now in the moulding hands of law; and that if, in a few cycles hence, these should be sought for here no trace of them might be found.

The present face of nature, it is plain, is no-wise stable; it moves before us like a diorama view, presenting only the changing and fleeting images of invisible causal forces that make and shift the scenes. In obedience to these, each season of the revolving year puts on an entire new form and vesture, and even no two consecutive rising suns reveal to us the natural world alike. The chemical and magnetic forces—which underlie the material crust of nature—are constantly busy weaving new patterns, sketching new pictures, moulding new shapes from the flexible stuff of matter, and right before our wondering eyes never ceasing to take down the old and put up the new scenery of this earthly stage. No substances are so hard and durable but they will pass off in fine exhalations at the commanding and transmuting touch of these hidden forces. No single form of matter is durable an instant but by their allowance. The entire substantial mass of the globe has no foundation of its own, but floats on a sea of invisible vital forces, to whose least motion it is as submissive as clouds to the air on which they ride, or as ships to the ocean on whose mighty breast they are dalled and tossed. Infinite wisdom and power are the solid abutments on which is spanned the immense arch of the outward universe; these withdrawn, and naught exists at all tangible or visible. Every form of matter represents some imperious gesture of the unseen causal energy. All that is ponderable, says science, is resolvable into ethereal elements; is resolvable, says philosophy, into abstract principles. The seen, which is temporal, melts into the capacious bosom of the unseen, which is eternal!

This is the confession, the instruction, of science. And if we listen to history, that will also confirm it.

Ever since man appeared on the earth, he has been toiling industriously and ingeniously in the workshop of the world, fashioning, forming, and producing new combinations and results from the tangible and palpable materials to his hand. Many, most of these results are stupendous and impressive. Powerful nations and states have been founded; great cities and towns have been erected and filled with magnificent specimens of architecture, sculpture, and painting; immense armies and navies have been collected; a universal commerce on the seas, and an intricate net-work of canal and railway communications on the land have been created; codes of laws and systems of government have been framed; literatures and libraries have sprung into existence; and, in brief, a grand, mighty, external paraphernalia of civilization has been evoked, as by magic, by the hand and brain of man: so vast and strong and complicate is it, that it would seem to be forever enduring and permanent. But, as we turn the pages of history to examine and admire all these material memorials of man, astonished we discover how they have faded and perished! We behold how his nations and states have been rent and scattered by internal throes and diseases; his towns and cities prostrated by the angry elements of nature and the accidents of his own conduct; his armies, navies, commerce and trade routed, dispersed, and ruined; his laws and governments trampled upon and overturned; his literatures and libraries lost, forgotten, and destroyed; the implements and accompaniments of his wealth and magnificence broken and dissipated; and the fabric of his mightiest civilization rolled together like a scroll, eaten and devoured by the corroding tooth of time.

All these, mark, were the material results of man's life and labor; all these the external manifestations of his capacities. And all these, mark again, have perished as often as they were created.

But not so has it been with the ideas, thoughts, principles, which these outward things embodied, symbolized, and reported: these, being imperishable, have not perished, but through all changings and overturnings have got themselves recorded, preserved, and added to the accumulating sum of human knowledge. Man's intellectual, moral, social life, seeking expression in outward manifestation, has pushed its way through all material environments and circumstances—striding over crumbling States, ruined cities; outstripping ships, out-running locomotives, outdoling laws, outwitting books, outlasting institutions, outliving all but time.

The essential human civilization of man has not perished with his material civilization. His invisible energy has continued when its visible strokes have faded out. He has lodged his vital power in outward manifestation, now here and now there; flashing forth his genius in many strong and admirable lines first on this page of history and then on that. But when the sound of his tread has died away, and the gleam of his presence vanished in one place, it has only been that they might reappear in another, with more astonishing and marvellous effects. The invisible creations of man,—his thoughts, his ideas, his imaginations, his aspirations,—time has availed nothing to destroy these: these have continuously grown into a strong and beautiful monument, whose base has broadened, whose column has lengthened, as the ages have swept hurrying by. Greece has perished, but its visions of beauty survive. The language of Homer and Plato is dead, but the song of the one and the thought of the other sing and breathe on in new accents forever. Israel is dispersed, but its glorious old prophets live and speak again in the young prophets of every generation. The institution decays and passes away, but the idea that made it knows no death, seeking and finding reappearance in many better forms. Temples crumble and altars fall, but Religion itself, whose offspring they are, bears upon her brow the blush of immortal youth, and the altar-fires of the soul burn with purer fervor as time and knowledge grow.

That endures which is real and not phenomenal. Man's invisible thought outlives his visible act. It comes and passes and returns. It touches and retouches, animates and reanimates, creates and resurrects. That which is unseen it suggests to be eternal; that which is seen it suggests to be temporal.

The experience also of every person comes to corroborate science and history. What with our outward vision, in our own daily circle, do we see? The moments of time are not more fugitive than all around us. Our hands clasp nothing securely, our eyes retain no image long: that which we possess to-day to-morrow snatches from us. This week we have stores in our cellar, money in our pockets, notes and bills and certificates of value in our safe; but next week, next month, next year, they have changed, become diminished, perhaps disappeared altogether—gone it may be to be another's property, but no longer ours: to us they were but are not. Nothing that we call property can we keep. It refuses to stay with us beyond a passing hour; it runs a race swifter than we or our children can keep pace with; it stops long enough to give us the idea of possession, and then snaps its finger in our face and vanishes away.

Not even forms of persons, groups of friends, are more steadfast. These too join with everything else to delude and to elude us; these too take part in that great game of "hide-and-go-seek," into which we all seem to be drawn and led on, pursued and pursuing, finding and losing. Friendship and love have no hands so tenacious that they can seize and hold the forms of those nearest and dearest to us. Where is that friend of my heart with whom yesterday I held such sweet counsel, whose hand lay in mine, whose glad eye-beam met mine and made a radiant pathway whereon our two souls walked and communed? Alas! gone, vanished quite, flown on the wings of time and change. Where is that brother, sister, son, daughter, father, mother, wife, husband, who so lately moved in our home to our heart's delight and mind's true peace? Where? The still air of the household breathes to the question an echo made of sighs. These all are hasted away, carrying with them precious links of the family chain, the remaining fragments of which jangle in our hands all out of tune.

Gone are these friends? Yes: all that was material of them is gone, never to return. But friendship, love—invisible essences of these transient forms—are these gone? No: they remain to bless us ever, and to grow brighter only as our hearts grow purer. Memory—ah! what a hand is here to grasp and hold! She still invokes the presences of these lost companions of our hearts. The best of them she restores to us speedily and surely. All the high intercourse we ever had with them we live over again so vividly. The thoughts they gave us we think again. The fire of intellect they kindled in us burns bright once more and leads us in their very company, like a guiding pillar, out on the track of truth. The aspirations they stirred in us still struggle upward and lift our souls and lives in daily endeavors towards the perfect. All of our friends that was invisible while they were visible,—which only our souls felt, our hearts realized,—this lingers with us still, and is linked with our memory and consciousness as with hooks of steel.

And the life that is most individual, most personal—this also adds its powerful confirmation to the transient character of the seen, the permanent character of the unseen.

How superficial, how frivolous and vapid is the average life of society! Its root is in such thin soil that what fruit it bears has no great ripening qualities in it, and so must speedily drop from the sapless boughs and perish. Whoso would have his life of a different nature, and its results of a different quality, must set it far deeper in underlying principles, and fertilize it with hopes and aims, with aspirations and endeavors much above the common owning. Society makes its time fugitive and profitless, by shredding it into fragments and bestowing them on paltry purposes. So few know its value, but waste it in the pursuit of the transient, the ever-eluding, never-satisfying. It takes well-nigh a lifetime for most of us to learn how to live—so great and high and hard of attainment is the fine art of living. How to discriminate between things that differ, how to discern the true from the false, the substantial from the ephemeral,—this is the great secret worth knowing: could some one impart it to us, he should be accounted our noblest benefactor.

The world of humanity is full of sheen and showy superficialities. A great "Vanity Fair," it invites us to walk through its crowded thoroughfares and make choice of what to us seems most desirable. What more natural than that we should begin by selecting what others select, that we should esteem that valuable which others highly estimate? The result is that we most times pay our money, and that which is far more valuable, for gewgaws and trinkets—for things that break and tarnish and fade and wear out in the using. But little abides and proves permanent of that which we gather and bear off on the back of years.

But those who can learn by experience grow wise as they grow old, or, rather, as they grow into immortal youth—for wisdom cancels age, and the power of true spiritual discernment so bridges time to eternity that the soul becomes elastic in its step and walks on unconscious of years. Experience slowly discovers to us the transiency of the unreal, the permanency of the real. Gradually we come to perceive how poor and cheap are the things we prized, how inferior that we spent our days in cherishing. We wake as from a dream and find all things changed. Worth, the sign of value, has shifted its position, has flown from all we hitherto deemed most valuable, and lights at last to rest on that to which we scarce gave any attention. We find ourselves swimming now in a wide sea of illusion, breasting the waves of the transient to reach the shore of the permanent. Only a few headlands loom out to us through all the fog-bank of deception, and the lights that glimmer along the coast are far between, though they warn us of a great continent of the real awaiting our faithful endeavor. We are astonished to find how different now are the things that attract us from those that formerly drew us on; our loves, our longings, our aspirations have swerved many a degree from the direction in which they formerly pointed. Our aim, our purpose, are new. We have come to ourselves—our real selves—and turn our back with alacrity on all of former self that was unreal and untrue. Clothes no longer allure nor deceive us: the naked fact we discern the just proportions of, while our enlightened and purified fancy robes it anew with the graceful charms of the ideal. Now, time reveals to us its value; past years count not so much in our estimation as present days, for now we live in hours more than we formerly lived in months. Quality, not quantity of life, is our concern; to be allied to imperishable realities, to make immortal truth and virtue a part of our life that now is, is the thought that absorbs us even more than that of any life to come. In our spiritual heavens new stars appear, and we walk in their pure and steady light content and peaceful, though the blazing sun of former joys and successes sinks to rise on us no more. Though the firm ground of life-long beliefs crumbles and vanishes beneath our feet, the firmer earth of faith in the integrity of the universe, in the continuity of principle and of law, comes to stay us, and our foundation is a deeper assurance, a profounder conviction than ever before.

What causes us most real pain in this passage in our experience from the transient to the permanent, is the widening gulf that stretches between us and former companions, between us and the thoughtless many. No longer is there a community of interests, of hopes, of aims, between us and them; but what is foolishness to their understanding is wisdom to ours, while our wisdom is to them a rock of offence and stumbling. They look still at the seen and temporal; we look at the unseen and eternal. Yet even this gulf is not impassable: it, too, belongs to the fleeting and transient. Here and there it shall be bridged by many an experience of the thither kept, and from time to time we shall behold glad feet hastening across to the hither side. And, until then, ours be the fidelity to keep the banner of loyalty to the real-ideal and the ideal-real waving high, to challenge and allure all those who have eyes to behold its brightness.

Carlyle compares the metaphysician to the Irish saint who swam across the channel, carrying his head in his teeth.

THE PICNIC AND THE CHURCH.

[From the N. Y. Union Advocate.]

The picnic excursions given to the poor children of the city of New York are among the memorable events of the summer of 1872. The first suggestion of giving the little waifs and vagabonds a taste of rural felicity was caught up eagerly by the people and drew from them almost without solicitation a fund for the purpose which has amounted to twenty thousand dollars. The delight afforded the little ones is incalculable; to leave their blacking boxes and street crossings, to lay down for a whole day their newspaper bundles and their baskets of cold victuals, to ride on a steamboat with plenty to eat, to be let free in a grove with swings and balls and jumping-ropes and plenty to eat again,—it was too much for words, it could only be expressed by shouts and clappings and summersaults of joy. Two parties immediately divided the gamins of the city,—those who had been and those who were going; it was the staple of the talk by day and the dreams by night. The little wretches were startled into the discovery of two amazing facts: the world had scenes of beauty never suggested by Baxter street, and there were people in it who cared even for them!

It was indeed a beautiful conception, worthy of all the unbounded praise it everywhere received, and worthy the still higher encomium it gained of being imitated in a score of other cities over the land. It was a conception too good ever to be lost, and we may confidently predict that the newsboys' picnics are henceforth an established institution among us.

But whose idea was it? It originated in a newspaper sanctum, among the editors of the New York Times. What a reflection is this upon the Church! In the city of New York there are some two hundred thousand Protestant Christians, comprising the most intelligent, wealthy, and influential of our citizens. How did it happen that they should go on for years jostled at every turn by these forlorn wretches, and yet leave the benevolent thought of a picnic for them to sprout up in a printing office? It is a Christian idea certainly; the Gospels are brimful of it, and yet the Church never heard of the movement till it was reported through the daily press!

What is the Church about? It is building fine sanctuaries on Fifth and Madison avenues, it is erecting brown-stone parsonages along side of them; it is hiring eight-thousand-dollar quartettes; it is sending large sums through denominational channels off here and there to start a rival sect in villages already supplied with the Gospel; it is propping up distant colleges and theological schools which have no reason for existing; and so busy is it with these partisan occupations that it does not notice the little wretches, prematurely care-worn eyes that peer into its doors, and does not know of the child in the tenement house which scarce ever hears the sound of a church bell.

Is this right? Has the Church of New York no mission in New York? Ought it to be disbursing its funds all over the land, and yet leave it for a secular newspaper to care for its own neglected poor?

A FUNERAL ADDRESS.

[From the Boston Investigator.]

MR. EDITOR:—I had the good fortune to bear your address at the funeral of the late Mr. Pinkham; and though I claim to be a Christian, yet I must do you the justice to say that your remarks, with one exception, were exceedingly appropriate and eloquent, and given in a manner so feeling and sympathetic that all who heard you were no doubt impressed, as I was, with your deep sincerity as well as evident ability. The remarks to which I took exception may seem proper enough to you, but under the circumstances they appeared so strange to me that I wrote them down, and in requesting you to print them I would respectfully inquire if the funerals of Infidels are always conducted in a similar manner.

After some general allusions to the nature of death and the attachment to life, and a review of the good character and useful labors of the deceased, you approached towards his coffin, and, as if addressing its inmate, said these words among others:—

"And now, respected friend, esteemed associate, and worthy brother, farewell. It is a hard word to speak even under ordinary circumstances, but, when spoken on an occasion like this, it causes the eyes to fill and the tongue to falter, for human nature will have its way in spite of religion or philosophy either. If we should meet again—and I wish we might—we will renew that pleasant companionship which your friends enjoyed with you for many years. If we meet no more, and this sad interview is to be our last, we shall not forget you. In all our meetings, in all our hours of festivity, and in all our efforts for promotion of the cause of reason and humanity, you will be kindly remembered, and we shall wish that our good friend Pinkham were with us. Once more, farewell, and though no monumental column should ever be reared to honor your name and memory, you will have a nobler monument in the living and beating hearts of those who knew you best."

This was eloquently and feelingly expressed, and I can truly say that I never was at a funeral where I was more affected or saw so many that were, for you have a peculiar manner of enlisting the attention and sympathy of your hearers. But tell me, my friend, is it possible that a man of your intelligence and sympathetic disposition can doubt of a hereafter? I have an interest in making this inquiry now, and at some other time I would like, if you are willing, to offer you some reasons for publication which may convince you that you are laboring under a strange error.

In friendship, yours very truly,

A LISTENER.

We publish the above because requested, and because we see no impropriety in our doing so, though what may be the particular motive of the writer in reporting some of our remarks on the occasion spoken of, we have no means of ascertaining. But be that as it may, as nearly as we can now remember he gives our words correctly; and while we thank him for his friendly and courteous expressions in our favor, we are bound in candor to declare that we do "doubt of a hereafter," as we see no evidence of it either in Reason or the Laws of Nature, and these are the best teachers that we know of at present. Still, as we are not infallible, we may be in error; and as, if we are, we shall esteem that man as our friend who sets us right, our unknown Christian correspondent ("A Listener") is welcome to the use of our columns for that good purpose.—Ed. Investigator.

THE BIBLE IN COMMON SCHOOLS.

(From the New York Globe.)

Notwithstanding the decision of the State Superintendent of Education that the Bible should not be read in schools, the Board of Education of Long Island City, or Hunter's Point, as it is more familiarly known, have decided to convene their schools at 8:45 A.M., for the reading of the Scriptures, not requiring the attendance of children of parents opposed to the service, until 9 A.M. This is apparently a very mild and harmless arrangement, since no one can find fault with the voluntary gathering of children of grown people to read the Scriptures when and where they please, provided they in no way infringe upon the rights or violate the consciences of others. But this arrangement at Hunter's Point is not altogether of this broad and liberal nature. The Board of Education convene the schools and establish the exercise, and thus take official action on what, according to the decision of the State Superintendent, they have nothing whatever to do with. The reading of the Scriptures by this plan is not the voluntary exercise of the children, but is a ceremony established by certain officers of the people, in buildings owned and occupied for a very different purpose, for the benefit of the whole people. If the reading of the Bible is anything but a mere farce, a mummery to be gone through to satisfy the bigotry of certain sectarians, then it must have for its object some sort of religious culture and development. The common school is not established for such purpose any more than the post office is. It is an instrument of the common people for the common purpose of securing those rudiments of education and intellectual culture on which our material and political progress depends, and has nothing to do with things spiritual. The facilities for worship, the days and ceremonies belonging to all shades of religious development are ample and fully recognized and protected by law. The liberty of conscience is absolute in this country, and no man by right of law can step between the heart of any man and his God. It is only where such perfect liberty exists that the truth can live, and it is because of such freedom that the attempt to crowd Bible reading upon common schools should fail. The common school belongs to the people, it is of them and for them. Now of the great commonality one class of people read one kind of Bible, though fearfully divided as to what it means, another class read another form of Bible, a third reject a portion of either translation, and a fourth look upon the whole book as myth and fable. Each individual of each class named may differ, and undoubtedly does differ from every other person in the nature and strength of his religious conviction and his view of the value and purpose of the good book. To lend the use of the common school to the reading and maintaining of the Bible is like the gratuitous use of the post-office for the dissemination of tracts from the American Tract Society, or from the Catholic publication Society.

What right have officers of the people, such as are the Board of Education at Hunter's Point, to say that children shall convene at any hour to read a Protestant Bible, a Douay Bible, the Hebrew Scriptures, or the works of Voltaire? Protestants will rebel in all cases but the first, Catholics in all but the second, Jews in all but the third, and free thinkers in all but the fourth. But the common school belongs to all these, and no Board of Education has the right to do violence to the motives and prejudices of one any more than to those of another. The Protestants are jealous, and justly so, of any influence of the Catholics over our common schools, and the desire of Francis Kernan for Governor, which is as sure to come as the day of election, will be due to this determination of the people that Catholic influence shall not predominate anywhere in the State. The wiser Catholics see this, and refuse to be a party to any attempt to secure political power. They declare their religion as pertaining to things spiritual, and propose to confine it to its own domain. Zealous Protestants should be capable of an equal degree of liberality. The common school, they admit, is no place for sectarian controversy. Let them go one step further, and determine that it shall be kept free of the slightest religious observance, and thereby prevent any provocation of that controversy which they deprecate.

GARIBALDI'S LAST.

(From the Brooklyn Catholic Review.)

Our correspondent sends us the following translation of the letter which has been addressed by General Garibaldi to the editor of the Momento, of Genoa:—

CAPRERA, August 2, 1872.

Democracy, by dividing into a number of separate groups its various shades of opinion, has lost much of its energy in useless disputes; and as disagreement on trifling subjects naturally spoils the work of the apostolate in its bearing on the matter of common and urgent necessity, in the present invitation which I make to all these parties to unite for their mutual good, I only follow the programme which I had traced for myself, whenever I have been asked to act on the arbitration in any contending question.

I perfectly understand that unanimity of conviction is not possible, even in the ranks of the soldiers of the future, and I do not intend that any one should sacrifice his convictions and violate his conscience; but I do insist that all should bow down before those great principles which were all-important for the welfare of our country.

If the Government, helped on by good luck, is retained in its place through cowardice, and persists in the neglect of duties, by the union of our forces we can either force it to accomplish them, or overthrow it.

To all friends of those who are in the foremost ranks, to those who fight the fight in the field of parliament, we propose conciliation, in order that they may work together, and thereby attain the sooner the end for which we have labored for so many years.

I must now indicate to you those matters of the highest importance which demand the vigorous support of the democratic party.

1. That the article of the Statute in which the Catholic religion is declared the religion of the State be abolished; for freedom of consciences cannot exist united with such a law. It must be abolished, and with it every privilege of the clergy, privileges granted to the priests, who are sworn enemies of civilization and of their country. To Rome restored to Italy is offered the task of performing this mission of human emancipation. The Government is to be blamed for its servility to foreign diplomacy, and justly accused of breaking the laws of the nation, when it hesitates to apply to the capital of the country the law for suppression of the convents, which has been effected in every part of the State.

We must insist that this law be carried out, and at once, so that the outrageous scandal of monastic institutions being tolerated in our capital shall cease forever.

We ask for the suppression of the religious corporations in Rome, without delay or any restrictions. And since the chain of prejudice cannot be broken save by education, we insist that henceforth education shall be obligatory, gratuitous, and lay. (No priest shall teach our little ones, and pervert their tender minds to the doctrines of the clericals.) The State, by tolerating priestly education, commits a crime, for it permits the insinuation, at an early age, of blind belief in the doctrines of Christianity, and thus enslave the minds and souls of our children.

Therefore, education must be obligatory, gratuitous, and lay. The restoration of the human intellect must be rendered complete, and even the working-man must have his share of material enjoyment and of the wealth which he earns for another who often permits him to die of want.

Taxation must be done away with, and especially those taxes which have been imposed on bread, on salt—and all those that fall heaviest on the poor. The reduction of the taxation will have to depend greatly on the diminution of the expenses. Therefore, financial embarrassments call for decentralization, and must be based upon the Commune, as was the case in the glorious traditions in Italy, and at the present time in America.

We must demand the full application of inherent and recognized liberties, so that the right of reunion and of the liberty of the press may cease to be a lie.

We ought to give our warm support to Universal Suffrage. It raises the disinherited to the dignity of citizens, restores to them their fundamental rights of citizenship, and only excludes those who are unable to read and write. The importance of this measure is well understood, for I have seen it encouraged by the vote of public meetings, the applause of numerous associations, and by petitions to the Parliament. This proves to me that the democracy feels that it ought to rally its forces, to obtain the triumph of the principles which lie at the root of the questions I have pointed out; nay, has almost been beforehand with me in its appeal for concord, which will bring about most desirable results.

Let us seek the best and not reject the good, when we can get it quickly by merely wishing for it.

G. GARIBALDI.

A little boy in Greenfield attended the Episcopal service on a recent Sabbath for the first time. When the rector appeared with his white robe, the youngster's curiosity was excited, and, watching the minister with open-mouthed wonder until the close, he asked his mother, as they came out of church, "Does he put that on to look like the Holy Ghost?"

CLERGYMAN.—How many essential elements are there in baptism?

Boy.—Three.

CLERGYMAN.—Three! Don't you know that there are only two—the Word of God and water?

Boy.—Why, there must be a baby, and isn't it an essential element?—New Covenant.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at OGDON HALL, St. Clair Street, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Cash Receipts for the week ending September 25.—Klotter Sons, $2; H. D. Peck, $2; A. H. Naamye, $2; Hauck & Windesh, $10; Duham & Co., 50 cts.; J. D. Zimmerman, $2; Wm. Hartung, $2; A. B. Woodcock, $1; D. H. Griswold, $2; Julius K. Rode, $4; Dr. B. Howe, $3.50; Geo. Maerer, $3.00; F. Frey, $1; J. D. Zimmerman, $10; Phoebe Ann Zimmerman, $10; Godfrey Gundrum, $10; Mrs. M. A. Wright, $10; O. W. Cook, 5 cts.; C. W. Weeks, 10 cts.; Augustus Towne, 60 cts.; John Gordon, $2; Wm. Elzey, 50 cts.; E. S. Dunham, $1; Maggie Devore, $1; V. H. Severance, $2; E. Reichbach, $2; H. P. Colton, $1; C. D. Martin, $1; Chas. W. Stercy, $2; M. H. Derham, 50 cts.; T. A. Kliney, $1.50; H. S. Stebbins, $3.98; Werner Becklin, $10; Joseph Giger, $10; Jacob Sprinkel, $10; Parker Pillsbury, $1; Joseph Wood $1.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand with 10¢ small amount, be liberal & filled to the same amount without further notice.

N. B.—THE INDEX is payable in advance. Its friends should not be offended if the paper is stopped at the expiration of their terms as indicated by the mail-tags. We have no means of knowing whether they wish it continued or not except by the receipt or non-receipt of the subscription price.

N. B.—Please examine the ADDRESS and DATE on your INDEX mail-tag, and report at once any error in either.

N. B.—If your INDEX mail-tag is not changed within three weeks after renewing your subscription, please notify us immediately. But do not write before the expiration of that time.

N. B.—Postage on THE INDEX is five cents per quarter, dating from receipt of the first number, payable in advance at the place of delivery.

N. B.—In case of any error in your mail-tag, always state the post-office at which the paper is received, and also the name just as it is now printed. Then state any desired correction.

N. B.—Please remit by post-office money-order, by registered letter, or by draft on New York. Cheques on interior banks are liable to discount, and the term of subscription will be proportionally shortened in the credit.

N. B.—When writing about a former remittance, always give the date of such remittance as exactly as possible.

RECEIVED.

PRINCIPLES OF GEOLOGY: or, The Modern Changes of the Earth and its Inhabitants Considered as Illustrative of Geology. By Sir CHARLES LYELL, Bart., M. A., F. R. S. Eleventh and Entirely Revised Edition. In Two Volumes.—Vol. II. Illustrated with Maps, Plates, and Woodcuts. New York: D. APPLETON AND COMPANY, 549 & 551 Broadway. 1872. 8vo. pp. 884.

INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF BIOLOGY. By H. ALLSTON NICHOLSON, M. D., etc., Professor of Natural History and Botany in University College, Toronto, etc. New York: D. APPLETON & Co. 1872.

A WAITING RACE. A Novel. By EDMUND YATES, Author of "Black Sheep," "Broken to Harness," etc. (Library of Choice Novels.) New York: D. APPLETON & Co. 1872.

PICTURE AT THE FAIR, AND OTHER POEMS. By ROBERT BROWNING. Boston: JAMES R. OSGOOD & Co. 1872.

SEPTIMIUS FELTON; or, The Ethic of Life. By NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE. Boston: JAMES R. OSGOOD & Co. 1872.

THE CHEST AT SOURCE OF DANGER TO THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC. By W. F. JAMISON, Chicago: Published by W. F. JAMISON, 125 & 141 Monroe Street. 1872. pp. 381.

THE CAUSES OF SOCIAL REVOLTS. A Lecture delivered in London, Portsmouth, Bradford, Nottingham, Derby, and Greenwich. Revised, with Notes. By Captain MAJOR, R. N. London: LONGMANS, GREEN, READERS, & DYES, PATERNOSTER ROW. 1872.

THE MYTHICAL ELEMENT IN CHRISTIANITY. By ED. VANHART NEALE, M. R. I.—THOUGHTS ON THE EXISTENCE OF EVIL. By Professor F. W. NEWMAN.—RATIONAL THEOLOGY. A Lecture delivered in the Freemasons' Hall, Edinburgh, on Sunday 3d March, 1872. By F. REGINALD STANHAM.—All published by THOMAS SCOTT, Esq., No. 11, The Terrace, Parkgate Road, Upper Norwood, London, S. E.

THE ORIGIN OF ALL RELIGIOUS WORSHIP. Translated from the French of DUPUIS, Member of the Academy of Inscriptions and of the National Institute of France during the First French Republic. Containing also a Description of the Zodiac of Denderah. New Orleans: 1872. pp. 428. (Not in print: copyrighted by C. C. W. MULLER.)

DREAM OF A FREE TRADE PARADISE, AND OTHER SKETCHES. By CYRUS RIGGS. With 12 Illustrations of HENRY L. STEPHENS. Philadelphia: Published for the Industrial League, by HENRY CARST BAIER, Industrial Publisher, 408 Walnut St. 1872.

THE ALDINE, October, 1872. New York: JAMES T. BUTTON & Co., 23 Liberty St. $5.00 a year.

LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE, October, 1872. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. $4.00 a year.

OLD AND NEW, October 1872. Boston: BOSTON BROTHERS, 143 Washington St. $4.00 a year.

WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE, October, 1872, Newburg, N. Y.: S. S. Wood & Co. $1.00 a year.

THE CHICAGO RAILROAD MONTHLY, September, 1872. Chicago: STREET & CAMP, 409 W. Randolph St. $1.00 a year.

THE MANCHESTER FRIEND, September, 1872. London: F. BOWEN KITTO, 3 Bishopsgate Street Without. $1.00 a year; address T. H. Speakman, 14 North Seventh St., Philadelphia.

PRICED AND DISPOSITIONS OF VALUABLE AND INTERESTING BOOKS. New York: DAVID G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000.

SHARES EACH $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 26, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED elsewhere, Seven Hundred and Fifty				$75,000
SHAYNE,
JOHN J. STEVENS, Oswego,	N. Y.,	One	Share	100
C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse,	"	"	"	100
J. HENRY CLARKE,	"	"	"	100
E. B. WALDO,	"	"	"	100
G. N. STARKES,	"	"	"	100
JOHN M. RICE,	"	"	"	100
MARSHALL BROS., Minneapolis,	Minn.,	"	"	100
S. LYDIARD, Long Lake,	"	"	"	100
J. G. RICHARDSON, Lake City,	"	* Two	"	200
DR. D. K. BOYNTON,	"	One	"	100
R. E. GRIMES, Minneapolis,	Minn.,	"	"	100
Mrs. E. CHOWNT, Portage City,	Wis.,	"	"	100
WM. H. ELLERT, Burlington,	Iowa,	"	"	100
LYMAN T. OSBORN, Auburn,	N. Y.,	"	"	100
P. C. TURNER, Albany,	"	"	"	100
M. SCHLESINGER,	"	"	"	100
JOSEPH KNIGHT, Troy,	Ohio,	"	"	100
L. S. BRYANT, Dayton,	Ohio,	"	"	100
L. F. GARDNER, Poughkeepsie,	N. Y.,	"	"	100
J. C. CHATTERTON, Rutherford Park,	N. J.,	"	"	100
W. J. LEWIS, Elion,	N. Y.,	"	"	100
HARVEY HAKES,	"	"	"	100
TABO. BROWN, Worcester,	Mass.,	"	"	100
C. W. ELSBROOK,	"	"	"	100
E. B. LORING, Boston,	"	"	"	100
JURGEN RIDGOUT,	"	Five	"	500
A. FOLSON, (in trust),	"	Three	"	300
JOHN WETHERSBERG,	"	One	"	100
F. A. GREENE,	"	"	"	100
R. S. DUNHAM,	"	Two	"	200
N. CUMMINGS,	"	One	"	100
CHAS. T. HOW,	"	Three	"	300
GEO. H. FOSTER,	"	One	"	100
A. A. KNIGHT,	"	"	"	100
GARDNER MURPHY,	"	"	"	100
GEORGE HENSHAW,	"	"	"	100
HENRY N. STONE,	"	"	"	100
H. E. MANN, Fond du Lac,	Wis.,	"	"	100
GODFREY GUNDBROW, Ionia,	Mich.,	"	"	100
F. H. HENSHAW, Boston,	Mass.,	One	"	100
W. C. HANNETT,	"	Two	"	200
Mrs. K. G. WELLS,	"	One	"	100
OSCAR ROOS, Taylor's Falls,	Minn.,	"	"	100
J. D. ZIMMERMAN, Union City,	Mich.,	"	"	100
PHILIP A. ZIMMERMAN,	"	"	"	100
GEORGE HENSHAW,	"	"	"	100
S. H. NYE,	"	"	"	100
CHAS. H. SPRING,	"	"	"	100
D. D. W. ROGERS,	"	"	"	100
				$81,300

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION:

CONDITIONAL STOCK LIST.

We, the undersigned, subscribers to the capital stock of the Index Association, agree to double our previous subscriptions to said stock on the same terms as before, taking respectively the additional number of shares set opposite to our names in the list below:

Provided, That the full sum of One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000) shall have been subscribed in good faith by the twenty-sixth day of October, 1872,—that is, within one year from the date when this INDEX passed into the hands of the Index Association.

ALEX. COCHRAN, Franklin,	Pa.,	Five	Shares,	$500
CHAS. A. GURLEY, Pulaski,	N. Y.,	Two	"	200
MAX PRAGOT, Cincinnati,	Ohio,	"	"	100
J. N. LYMAN, Columbus,	"	One	"	100
WALTER F. AUSTIN, Pittsburgh,	Pa.,	Two	"	200
JAS. R. STONE, Cincinnati,	Ohio,	One	"	100
A. M. HOWLAND, Boston,	Mass.,	Five	"	500
				$1,800

NOTICE.

Attention is called to the revised advertisement of the publications of the Free Religious Association in another column. The back Annual Reports of the Association give in the best form the history of the organization, and contain addresses by Emerson, Phillips, Wesson, Wells, Higginson, Johnson, Frothingham, and others who have spoken on its platform. The Report for this year discusses some of the most living questions of the day. The friends of the Association cannot do a better service for it than by circulating these publications.

WM. J. POTTER,

Secretary.

In early childhood we used to see every Sunday a church music-book entitled "The Christian Lyre." This title sorely perplexed our infant mind, as we had been taught that Christians always told the truth. If we were to renew our childhood without losing the wisdom gained by the diligent perusal of religious journals, we should now take "The Christian Lyre" quite as a matter of course.

"The naturalist," says Mr. Weiss [American Religion, page 23], "sees everywhere through the continuity of law a God who says to him, 'I Am.' The supernaturalist jumps in with his god from time to time, and, like the clown in the circus, cheerily announces, 'Here we are!'"

The Index.

OCTOBER 5, 1872.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

N. B.—All letters, business or otherwise, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio."

SPECIAL NOTICE.—THE INDEX will be enlarged to sixteen pages at the commencement of its fourth volume, Jan. 1, 1873. After Sept. 28, 1872, the price of subscription will be $3.00 a year, in advance. But every subscriber, new or old, who remits $3.00 at once will be credited with a year's subscription from Jan. 1, and will meantime receive the paper free, if not already paid for.

"CHRISTIANITY AND FREEDOM."

Under the above caption we publish in an INDEX SUPPLEMENT this week an able and extended communication from Rev. Francis T. Washburn, of Milton, Massachusetts, a Unitarian clergyman well known in his own denomination by his frequent contributions to Unitarian periodicals. It is a continuation of correspondence published in THE INDEX, No. 114, and would have been printed several months ago, if we could have compiled earlier with the writer's wish that we should make a detailed reply. For convenience of reference we have numbered the paragraphs in his article, and propose to consider them in order.

1. The original question concerned "authority" in religion and science.—Mr. Washburn maintaining that Jesus possesses an "authority" in religion entirely different from that of Galileo in science. It was our opinion that "authority" in any special sense could not be predicated of Jesus. Mr. Washburn then defined the "authority" he claimed for Jesus as "the inward power and influence justly exercised over our spirits by his spirit, by virtue of its intrinsic excellence;" and he explicitly disclaimed for him any "absolute infallibility or absolute moral perfection."

Is it not an "admission" of a very marked kind to surrender what is regarded by all Christian theologians of high eminence as the chief characteristics of the "authority of Jesus;" namely, infallibility and sinlessness? In their view, it is these two attributes which constitute the special features of his "authority;" and to give them up will most certainly be considered as an "admission" fatal to Mr. Washburn's own position. The sort of "authority" he now claims for Jesus is not at all different in kind, but only in application, from that of Galileo. And we are quite ready to admit that Mr. Washburn's view is so far "scientific" because it has ceased to be "Christian."

2. We do not regard freedom even as a "method," much less as "contents." It is simply a condition of that scientific method which alone should furnish the contents of religious belief.

3. It is pleasant to agree with Mr. Washburn so completely as we do in the opinion that "an infallible and sinless man is inconceivable." He will permit us to wonder, however, that from such a premise he can proceed to infer a special "authority" in Jesus different from that of other men.

4. The discussion would be greatly shortened, if Mr. Washburn would only say "influence" when he means influence, and not uselessly complicate matters by saying "authority" instead. Nobody disputes the fact of influence; we certainly do not. But in all Christian writings the word "authority," as applied to Jesus, has acquired a meaning which includes infallibility and sinlessness. We object on principle to the attempt to rationalize the technical words of Christian theology. Let them go; the English language is rich enough to dispense with them. Their only use now is as "survivals" of barbarism,—fossils that belong to a past epoch.

5. We have no interest whatever in the inquiry how great or how little is the personal influence exercised by Jesus over individuals. If it helps any to be virtuous, we are glad of it. A great many illusions of imagination tend for a while to purify the mind, as Professor Newman so finely showed with regard to the Christian "Vision of Heaven." But the personal Jesus must ultimately lose power over the world in proportion as the belief in his infallibility and sinlessness dies out. Mr. Washburn is very sanguine in expecting that humanitarianism will be eventually Christian; experience teaches the contrary. We are quite willing to leave him to the instruction of further thought and wider observation; for we cordially admire the sincere and truth-loving spirit he exhibits.

6. It is a mistake to suppose that the favorable influence of humanitarianism on character has anything to do with Jesus. Its influence is beneficial because it sets men free from him and his claims to mastership. What we reverence in men like Dr. Furness and Dr. Bartol is due to themselves,—to their free obedience to the law of their own natures as part of the Universal Law. So far as any man is warped into imitation, we pity, but do not admire him. The "Western mind" has a better destiny than that of reflecting a confessedly fallible and imperfect character.

7. With all deference we must confess that we have sought in vain to get light from Mr. Washburn's seventh paragraph upon the distinction he tries to explain. It appears, on the contrary, that the distinction vanishes altogether, and that "authority" without infallibility and sinlessness means nothing but simple influence.

8. Taking the New Testament itself as a witness, and waiving all doubts of its authenticity, the evidence that Jesus stands at the head of humanity is feeble indeed. In our estimation, the character of Socrates is in many respects a far grander study. If intellect has any place at all in religion, the intellectual superiority of Socrates over Jesus makes him in that respect his religious superior also. Furthermore, some of the most fundamental virtues of a fine character, such as the spirit of justice and veneration for natural rights, are far more marked in the Greek than in the Jew. What right, for instance, had Jesus to send a legion of devils into a great herd of swine, drowning the poor animals and impoverishing their luckless owners? Mr. Washburn needs to read the New Testament with a freer mind.

9. The great virtues and special merits of Jesus are not hidden from our eyes; but it certainly is to us a "random assertion" to say of him or any other that he is the "supreme man" of the race. It would be as safe to assert that a particular blade of grass is the finest on a great western prairie. Who knows or can know the fact?

10. The question—"Who is the holiest man?" still seems to us a perfectly idle one. It is by no means synonymous with the question—"Who is our greatest helper in religion?" In the endeavor to attain our highest ideal excellence, a single noble friend may often exert more helpful influence than all the sages of the past combined. Even the Bible declares that "a living dog is better than a dead lion." So far as we are from "wiping persons out of Nature," that we regard persons as Nature's finest product; and those persons are the finest whose personal life is least vine-like or dependent. The best helper is he who shames us out of a mistletoe existence, and compels us to strike root into the common soil. Of this we are assured, that he whose teaching directly tends to keep men in personal dependence on himself cannot possibly be the "supreme man." Whoever, like Emerson, teaches men the gospel of self-help and self-reliance is, in at least one vital point, his manifest superior.

11. We have already answered the question here propounded, so far as we can. There is no absolutely "supreme man" in all respects, as Mr. Washburn admits; and he therefore limits his phrase thus—"supreme man in religion." But there is no absolutely "supreme man" in religion itself. Admitting for the sake of argument that in some respects Jesus excels all other men religiously, we must still say that he is himself excelled religiously by every man who is imbued with the modern spirit of freedom and equal rights. These are an essential part of the religion now most wanted by the world.

12. It is impossible for us to follow all Mr. Washburn's speculations about "centres." What man should be confessed as the "centre" of his race, or the "central spiritual force of humanity," is a question in which we have lost all interest.

Which is the biggest drop in the ocean? Which drop causes the tides? It appears quite as important to discuss these questions as the other; but we see no prospect of an answer in either case. That such problems have any direct bearing on the "oneness or solidarity" of man, is at least questionable. The unity of man rests on a common nature, not on a common relationship to some individual. Each man attracts his fellows, and is attracted by them, in proportion to spiritual mass or weight; and it is this mutual gravitation which makes them one, not the supposed overpowering attraction of a single person.

13. We have no objection to urge against the principle of religious association. But it does not follow that we must accept a Pope—"the best man at the head." Is there no such thing as democracy in religion? True, every chief executive officer is an individual; but he must be a live individual. How is it possible for a dead man like Jesus to be the actual head of an institution like the Church? It is the merest metaphor to call him such. The words really mean nothing. The "head of the Church" is the man who governs it, not the man whose name it has inherited. Catholics have such a head; Protestants please their fancy by calling Jesus their head, and doing as they themselves please; radicals do as they please without going through the farce of electing King Log.

The "practical question," in our judgment, is simply this: "How am I to make myself the best and most useful man?" This depends, not on solving the irrelevant problem of the "supreme man" or "greatest brother," but simply on cultivating and properly using the natural faculties of humanity. It is time to "interpret God" for ourselves.

What Sir Charles Lyell writes of Werner in reference to geology is true of Jesus in reference to religion; and it shows that science suffers as much as religion from this inveterate proneness to invent a "supreme man." The passage, as contained in the last edition of the Principles of Geology, is this: "Although the natural modesty of his [Werner's] disposition was excessive, approaching even to timidity, he indulged in the most bold and sweeping generalizations; and he inspired all his scholars with a most implicit faith in his doctrines. Their admiration of his genius, and the feelings of gratitude and friendship which they all felt for him, were not undeserved; but the supreme authority usurped by him over the opinions of his contemporaries was eventually prejudicial to the progress of the science; so much so as greatly to counterbalance the advantages which it derived from his exertions." Such, with all respect for Mr. Washburn's ability and excellent spirit, must be the result of the excessive deference he pays to the "authority" of Jesus; and his article reminds us of the Nation's allusion to the Broad Church party in England, which it characterizes very aptly as "that earnest but not altogether intelligible body of men within the confines of the Establishment who succeed to their own satisfaction in blending faith, the authority of reason, the authority of history, and the authority of the personal perception of the true, the beautiful, and the good, into a mixture rejected alike by the rationalist and the great body of believers."

In reporting the public banquet given in Boston on the second of August to the Japanese embassy, the New York Tribune states that "the bill of fare was printed in Japanese and American, and due deference to heathenism was shown in the omission of the customary invocation." Was the invocation part of the bill of fare? If anything is absurd, it is the practice of public prayer over a steaming table of roast goose. A frightful suspicion of cannibalism must flash across the mind of every participant who remembers the anserine nature of the whole proceeding.

There is matter for thought in the above incident. Courtesy, it seems, required the omission of the Christian "grace" at a banquet shared alike by Christians and pagans; does it not also require the abolition of chaplains and all other ecclesiastical features from the administration of a government supported by people of all religious beliefs? If courtesy does not, equality does.

SIGNS OF DECADENCE.

From a map of the city of New York, prepared for sanitary purposes by the Council of Hygiene and Public Health in 1885, seven years ago, it appears that the churches of all denominations have been steadily following the march of fashion up town. At that date, and the figures would be much more startling now, the first inspection district—comprising the extreme end of the city, now largely given up to business, indeed, but still containing multitudes of wretched attic and cellar folk—had eleven churches; the second seventeen; the third twenty-eight; the fifth seventy-two; the eighth ninety-six; the tenth one hundred and twelve; the twelfth one hundred and thirty-eight; the sixteenth one hundred and ninety-two; the eighteenth two hundred and twenty-two; the twentieth two hundred and forty-one; the twenty-second two hundred and seventy-eight; and so on. The difference in the quality of the churches is more marked than the difference in the number of them. The temples become costlier as they move away from the abodes of the humble people. The down town meeting-houses are small chapels, dingy, cheaply furnished and unattractive, placed in narrow streets and inconspicuous in external appearance. The up-town sanctuaries are imposing temples of marble or free-stone, with towers, pinnacles, statues, stained windows, and ornaments of many-colored stones. They stand conspicuous on the great avenues, costly without, and within gorgeous with carvings, mouldings, panels, canopies, screens all ablaze with azure and gold; they are churches where people have at least the satisfaction of knowing themselves guiltless of offering to the Lord that which "had cost them nothing." The gold, frankincense, and myrrh are lavishly brought. None are permitted to enter the spiritual festival chamber without the wedding garment; the walling and gnashing of teeth are never to be heard within these richly painted walls; the prayer for mercy on miserable offenders is offered with other associations of short coming than those of sin. It is reported that in the marriage service the word "love" is now and then substituted for "goods" in the bridegroom's vow—the "goods" being hypothetical, and the "worldly" quality of the "love" being indisputable. The next change may be the omission of the word "us" from the first petition of the litany, the "miserable sinners" so earnestly supplicated for being understood to be the wretched outsiders who do nothing to support the lordly worship. Within the space of a few squares in the fashionable quarter of New York, the gaudy sanctuaries are clustered so thickly together that the singing of the choirs might in some instances disturb the neighboring congregations. In close proximity to the spot where Mr. Hepworth's new "church for the people" is, perhaps, to be erected, stand the new church of St. Bartholomew, an ecclesiastical edifice "of the extremest description," the "New England Church," Mr. Tyng's, Dr. Chapin's which we class as "Orthodox," Dr. Hastings', the "Church of the Heavenly Rest" (surmounted by four gilt angels judiciously kept in place, for their dumb show of trumpet-blowing to the four corners of the earth, by iron braces), St. Alban's Chapel, the great Temple Immanuel, St. Thomas' superb pile, and a mighty edifice of stone with painted arches, flying buttresses, carved mullions, and other useless imitations of the great architectural ages. Not far off, the white marble cathedral is springing up above the neighboring houses. This is at present the select quarter of the town. We may be sure that no impecunious Christian will find accommodations in any of these temples except the Romish cathedral. There will be no distinction of persons within those walls. The church of Rome is democratic. Her edifices, however stately and expensive, are built by the people and used for the people. Worldliness has the monopoly of nothing.

These signs indicate that Christianity is becoming aristocratic. The church of Rome still cares for the common people, after its lamentable and hurtful fashion, but the wealthy Protestant sects let them alone, bid for popularity, pamper the spirit of worldliness, compete with theatres and concert rooms in the matter of display and luxury, and seek aggrandizement by the usual commercial artifices. To the careless passer-by, this luxury of church architecture is a witness to the increasing power and influence of the Christian religion; to the thoughtful observer it is a confession of its decline. The live church is the church of the people. The increasing church is that in which the people take an increasing interest; in which the poor have a place; in which the simple, unpretending, unworldly, and humble feel concern. At present these are found, to their serious detriment, we believe, only in the "Catholic" church, which is on that account the prevailing church in modern society. But the great multitude are not there either. They have lost their sympathy and broken their connection with the organized forms of the Christian faith. Many meet nowhere for worship or meditation. Those who meet assemble in public or semi-public halls, for discussion of social and political questions. The Spiritualists collect in multitudes; the Postivists gather in small groups; "infidelity" in various guises has its devotees; the workmenmen conspire instead of communing; the popular mind, so far as it is intelligent, ferments in vessels of its own, and allows the smallest admixture of Christian ideas. Christianity has become the fashionable religion, and in becoming fashionable has ceased to be vigorous. The substance of a faith is never proportionate with its show. The more majestic it seems to be, the more hollow it is; for the life of it is interior. It is not a sign of its opulence that it can move up town and make the Lord's house as handsome as the millionaire's. It would exhibit its power to more advantage by making the millionaire go down to the temple to pray. It becomes a lackey when it tags after him.

O. B. F.

THE WILLIAMS FUND.

Perhaps enough has already been said in these columns on the "Williams Fund." Only a few readers of THE INDEX can be interested in it except for the general principle involved in the case. But this general principle is of sufficient importance, as it seems to me, to warrant some additional remarks; especially as the editor of THE INDEX has given his strong endorsement to the action of the Trustees. I am not willing that the Trustees, in the rule of restrictions which they have adopted, should have the benefit of such able endorsement, and from one in the van of religious progress, without some further protest. Let me say, then, referring for the facts of the matter to my previous article of August 24, that, after thoughtfully considering the whole question in the light of the editor's article of September 7, I remain in my old opinion. In withholding aid from a student recommended by the Faculty of Harvard Divinity School as every way worthy, for the sole reason that he declined to sign a paper declaring his intention to enter the "Christian ministry" because the word "Christian" he thought involved a test of doctrinal belief, the Trustees, in my judgment, have violated both the letter and the spirit of the bequest which put the funds into their hands.

That the Trustees have acted conscientiously is not questioned. They are honorable and true men. The only question is, Have they given a rational and just interpretation to the Williams Will under which they act? That Will established a fund for the aid of indigent and meritorious students "preparing for the ministry," with the proviso that "no such student shall be debarred of this charity by reason of entertaining any peculiar modes of faith, it being always understood that he must be a Protestant." Mr. Abbot defends the action of the Trustees on the ground of this latter clause which limits aid to Protestants, since the word "Protestant," as he says, according to proper and familiar usage, means a "Protestant Christian." But I do not think that it is on the ground of this clause that the Trustees have prepared their test-declaration for the students to sign. The phraseology of that declaration implies that they draw authority for it from Mr. Williams' expression of purpose to aid those who are "preparing to enter the ministry;" they argue that he meant the Christian ministry.

and therefore in the test-statement of purpose which they now require that applicants for aid shall sign they add the word "Christian" to his phrase. But in either case, whether they claim authority for their action in the one or the other clause, they have certainly added to the letter of the Williams Will. In their interpretation of his intention, they use a word which he did not use; and it is just that word which raises the question of conscience in some students' minds in respect to doctrinal beliefs.

The inquiry, therefore, arises, Does the spirit or intention of the Will require this word to be used in interpreting it? In seeking the answer to this question what we have really to discover is, not what would have been in Mr. Williams' mind if this or that had been suggested to him as he was writing his Will, but what actually was in his mind. Very likely if any bystander had said to him at that time, "You mean by 'ministry' the 'Christian ministry' of course, and by 'Protestant' a 'Protestant Christian,'" he might have answered, "Yes, certainly." So other things might have been suggested which would have modified and essentially changed his intention and induced him to write an utterly different Will from the one he did write. But these suppositions do not lead us to, but only away from his own real intention. That we must discover from the words he actually used and from the general purport of the bequest. And the central thought that was in Mr. Williams' mind when he wrote this bequest seems to me very plain. It was to help worthy students for the ministry irrespective of theological and sectarian opinion. That was his primary purpose. And he added the clause limiting the bequest to Protestants more, as it seems to me, to emphasize this purpose than for any other reason. The Roman Catholic church did not believe in the right of free inquiry and of private judgment; it assumed to determine the faith of its adherents; and therefore he would not give his money for training its theological students for the priesthood. Catholicism was excluded from his bequest because he believed it to deny that freedom in respect to "modes of faith" upon which he had just insisted in the preceding clause. In other words, taking the two clauses of the sentence together and letting them interpret each other, it seems to me clear that Mr. Williams used the word "Protestant," not in its positive sense as a general term for all Christian sects except the Catholic church, but in its primary and historical and still quite as familiar meaning in which the main idea is assertion of the right of private judgment in opposition to the claims of Catholicism. He meant to close the door in the rear, so that his money should not flow back in any retrograde movement in behalf of Rome, but he left the door wide open in front in behalf of Protestant advance and free reason. And therefore I think that his Trustees, in establishing a test of belief for beneficiaries through the use of the word "Christian," have departed from the spirit and intent of his bequest.

But some persons may say that he did not foresee that the Protestant free reason would ever lead any students of a professedly Christian theological school to deny or to doubt the special authority of Christianity itself; that, if he had done so, he would most certainly have closed the door in front at that point also. But this objection rests on two assumptions neither of which is admissible; first, that the issue which is now presented to the theological student, as to the meaning of the word "Christian" and as to his right to the name, could have been presented in Mr. Williams' time and been made clear to his mind; second, that, if he had understood it, he would have insisted on the "Christian" name. As to the first, it would not have been possible at that day to have stated the question as it is now developed, What is it to be a Christian? To have asked Mr. Williams if he did not mean by "Protestant" a "Protestant Christian," would not have touched the question which is now at issue at all; and if the question at issue could not have been presented, nothing could have been learned with regard to his intention concerning it. As to the second, I argue from the tenor of Mr. Williams' Will that, if he could have understood the question now at issue concerning the word

"Christian," he would have been quite as likely to side with those who do not insist upon its appropriation as with those who do. Even in his own day I think he would probably have said to any one asking if his beneficiary theological students should be "Christian," "Yes, if you mean by Christianity love to God and man,"—for that was the customary synonyme which the more liberal Unitarianism adopted a generation or two ago, and to that the language of the Williams Will points. At any rate, he committed his legacy to the advancing tide of the Protestant principle of the right of private judgment, and evidently with his eyes open; and we have no right to assume that he would now complain that the tide is carrying the benefits of his gifts where he did not expect them to go, or that it will do so unless his Trustees shall at a certain place build a dyke to stop their free passage. And since I believe (in this, I think, agreeing with my friend Abbot) that Free Religion is the legitimate result of the Protestant Reformation, or, to adopt his own words, that "the history of Protestantism is the history of the growth of Free Religion," so I hold that any gifts which have been committed freely and in faith to the Protestant tide may be rightfully shared by believers in Free Religion.

The Christian Register thinks that this is not a question for newspapers but for the courts. But unfortunately courts, like newspapers and trustees, are human and not always free from theological bias. No one of the three is above enlightenment; so let us have free discussion.

W. J. P.

A DILEMMA.

The Christian Statesman of September 14 says:—

"Touching Mr. Greeley's private morality we are not carefully informed. It has been repeatedly and publicly stated, long before his nomination for the Presidency, that in moments of excitement he does not fear an oath." But concerning his political principles there can be no question. They are simply atheistic. In the Tribune of March 7th, 1865, he wrote: 'This is not a Christian country. France, Spain, Austria, Mexico, are Christian countries, no matter how many of their inhabitants may be non-Christians. This country is not Christian, though the majority of its inhabitants probably are. Almighty God is not the source of all power and authority in the American government. The American people are such source.'

These sentences Mr. Greeley afterwards defended in a private interview, and refused to admit the teachings of the Bible as authoritative on the subject. Similar extracts from his writings might be made at great length. No Christian can consistently vote for a man who holds and teaches such principles."

Will the Statesman please explain in what sense it holds that this is a "Christian country"? If, as it claims, our present form of government is not Christian, and cannot be made such without a special constitutional amendment, then it is at present as "atheistic" as Mr. Greeley. But if the government is Christian as it is, then it needs no amendment to rescue it from "atheistic principles." In the former case, Mr. Greeley does but record a wicked fact which the Statesman admits and deplores; in the latter case, the Statesman is working for an amendment which is confessedly needless. Certainly God cannot be regarded even by the Statesman as the "source of all power and authority" in a confessedly atheistic government. If he is, he must be held to approve atheism himself; in which case the Statesman is now fighting against him!

We expect our contemporary, therefore, whose candor we respect as sincerely as we appreciate its courtesy, to concede frankly that Mr. Greeley's statement is correct in point of fact; that in its own opinion the country and its government are now "atheistic;" and that the adoption of the proposed amendment is necessary in order to elect God as the "source of all power and authority" in the American government. For if the adoption of this amendment by the people converts the government from atheism to Christianity, then it cannot be denied that God is to become the "source of all power and authority" by popular election alone. This is a point quite overlooked by our Christian-Amendment friends.

In appealing to the people to declare God the source of all political power, they quite forget that they thus recognize the people itself as the source of all such power. They are playing with edged tools. No government is Christian which thus raises God to the throne by a popular vote, and makes him a mere deputy of the popular will. The Christianizers have got hold of the Romish theory without knowing how to manage it. Every Christian government seizes and retains its power "by the grace of God," without consulting the people at all; as has been done by the Papacy. Whoever for an instant considers the absurdity of trying to make this a Christian government by Congressional and State legislation, will perceive that the present Christianizers are but the forerunners of the Jesuits, who, if the people ever surrender their autonomy, will soon step in to reap the fruits of their folly.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

A WORD ON THEINE.

TIPPECANOE CITY, Ohio, Sept. 7, 1872.

MR. ABBOT:

Permit me to say through your paper that, as there is quite a controversy in it between Theists, Atheists, and the Orthodox as to their notions about God, I can see but little or no difference in their opinions. The Theists and Orthodox believe in a God of infinite perfections—power, wisdom, justice, etc. Do not such attributes bind the actions of such a being in as definite a course as eternal necessity—which is the God of the Atheist, although he says he has no God, or there is no God. I think the Orthodox ascribe to their God actions inconsistent with the attributes they give him.

I will simply add that, as it appears to me, there must be, or must have been, in the eternal nature of things, a God,—as much wisdom, design, as ever crops out in their or his actions and reactions on each other, whether such design is seen in the doings of the vegetable, mineral, or animal kingdom; on the principle that the stream never runs higher than its fountain.

E. L. CHANE.

"ORTHODOXY AND SELFISHNESS."

BY REV. E. C. TOWNE.

The Independent has criticised, in a recent editorial, my charge against the popular faith of the day in the churches calling themselves Christian, that it is selfish, and protests that the impeachment is unjust. The gist of its argument is that in seeking the salvation of self, the saint seeks salvation from this very selfishness which I charge him with, and puts the seeking of that first.

To this I reply with a question. Does the average popular believer thus keep uppermost his own purity, not his own safety? I have not passed judgment on the radical idealist in Orthodoxy. I know very well that the popular faith is mere old clothes to the best minds in the Orthodox sects, worn only outwardly, and that only from the power of sacred association. I am ready even to admit, and indeed to assert where it is not admitted, that plenty of nominally Orthodox people have quietly slipped out of the old garb of faith, consciously or unconsciously, and are not liable to my charge that a selfish motive is at the heart of their religion—not of their manhood or womanhood perhaps, but of their specially religious thinking and feeling. But all this does not alter the fact that the popular Christianity, that of average people now and of the average past, has been and still is distinctly selfish.

The Independent sadly fails to take due note of two conspicuous warnings which apply to this question—one that which refers to the impossibility of finding one's life in religion except by losing it, and the other that which points out the deceitfulness of the human heart. Our firm conviction is that, if God be what Orthodoxy has portrayed him, and the Devil be another, as Orthodoxy has it, nearly the entire Christian church from the beginning to this day will be found in hell, for want of heeding these two beacon warnings of their own original faith. It is easy for a reasoner to claim that he seeks his own salvation purely from love of holiness, and not from love of self, but our Calvinism at least denies that. If there be one thing more sure than another to us, it is that the power to do that does not belong to man. To think that it does is deceit and delusion. If God's wrath against sin be what the current dogmas have represented it, not one of those who have clung to the redeeming cross can be saved, but only those who, for love of holiness, and of God, and of God's creatures, have entirely given up their own chance, and been willing to be cut off and shut out without hope or help. Assuming that atonement is as the Orthodox system makes it, not one of those who seek its benefits can be saved, but only those whom atonement has impressed to go wholly out of self, away even from atoning favor, to offer the pure sacrifices of holiness in service without suspicion of reward. This is sound teaching from all the great points of view—Hebrew, Christian, and rational. Either divine grace is without reference to our failures, or only those will be saved who submit to be lost. There is no nice balancing of the human heart on a line of pure love exactly parallel to the line of self-love. The former cuts straight across the latter. On high Calvinistic-transcendental grounds we unhesitatingly warn our brethren of the Independent that, if Orthodoxy is true, their steps take hold on hell, and that it will not help them a particle to be able to say, "Why, Good Lord, we distinctly and particularly cast out the devil of selfishness in thy redeeming name." The Eternal Reason replies to all such claims, "I never knew you." Selfishness is not cast out in that way. A man does not become broken and contrite with a spiritual life-preserver on. It is the bag of wind that does the business in all this Orthodox swimming. Judgment will so prove it as to find it wanting.

And it is even more true of historical faith than of individual. The mass are at a low level, and the mass of Christians have been at a lower level than that of some other religions—Buddhism for example. It seems to us beyond question that no great religion has been so offensive to an "Angry God" as Christianity has been,—because none has so presumed upon a plan for getting round him, and into safety. I know if I were an "Angry God," I should put Christians on the coals first, Mohammedans on them, and Buddhists on top, and garnish with the small fry of savagery. Of all the great faiths, there has been more "pure cussedness" of conceit and pretension in the Christian than in all others put together. Selfish! The average Christianity of history has been one of the worst forms of sin.

SCIENCE AND SPIRITS ONCE MORE.

If Mr. Abbot will allow me a little space, I wish to say a few words upon the much-vexed topic of Spiritualism, before its further discussion in THE INDEX shall be tabooed; as I fear it may be, in consideration of the limited capacity of that highly-charged little "medium."

Is there really any occasion for mourning or quarrelling over the fact that men of science as a rule (not without honorable exceptions) stand aloof from the so-called spiritual phenomena? In experimenting for tests, the qualities most in demand are power of close observation, cool and accurate judgment, patience, and a fair amount of courage, moral and physical. Just so far as scientific men surpass their neighbors in these qualifications, it would appear that their opinion is of superior value—and no farther.

Suppose Professor Huxley were to take next month a vacation-voyage to America, and that in passing through the country, say from Boston to Toledo, he should stop at Moravia, N. Y., for the purpose of investigating "psychic force." It appears to him in the form of his grandmother, who advances toward him from behind a black screen, her look and dress precisely corresponding with his boyish recollections. There is the antiquated cap of dotted muslin, the string of gold beads about her neck, the black silk work-pocket that stirred his youthful heart with hopes of hidden "goodies," slung upon her arm. He approaches the apparition, and it vanishes. He pursues it into the cabinet, but there is no one there save the medium, who is totally unlike an apparition. He questions the soundness of his optic nerve; but the phantom again appears, and this time addresses him in a voice that could belong to no other than his grandmother. She recalls to his memory long-forgotten incidents, and relates others of which he has no knowledge, but which are afterwards verified.

What can science do in the case? Suggest to the Professor that he has been all along unconsciously cherishing a mental image of his venerable relative, which now, assisted by some phosphoric aura emanating from the medium, is projected into space and made to look and speak like a living person? Very possibly; or it may suggest the "organic thought-germ theory" (whatever that may be), or the "unconscious cerebration theory." But, sitting close beside him in the circle there is a shrewd, clear-headed, well-balanced young farmer, who is cogitating precisely the same things. He does not know the abc of science, but he is saying to himself, "After all, isn't it just possible that all this, somehow or other, comes out of my own head?"

The bereaved and consoled mother who gave her testimony in a late INDEX (No. 133) had been an unbeliever; had a questioning, analytical mind; was afraid of being imposed upon. Would any man detect hallucination or imposture quicker than she? Or could she have detected it sooner for knowing intimately the nature and properties of—

"All the gases
That have power to raise the masses!"

That scientists do not always possess all the qualifications required by the "genuine scientific spirit," I lately had proof in the confessions of a young English gentleman of rising repute at home as a student of science, whom I met a few weeks since in Washington. Conversation turning upon the Cox and Crookes controversy, I inquired why the vexed question was not subjected to some crucial trial, which should make final decision upon its claims. His answer was: "We have tried to test it, but it evades all our tests." Subsequently, however, he owned that the "psychic club" of which he had been a member, after experimenting prosperously for some time with the raps, weighing tables, et cetera, were suddenly dispersed by an astonishing communication! It was rapped out for them at a daylight sitting; and was so inscrutable in its origin and startling in its purport, that the club with one consent dissolved its sitting, agreed to say nothing about it, and never met again! It is easy to see where the evasion was in this instance. If Mr. — sees this, he will remember that he told the story in a large company as a good joke, adding that, "seriously, he didn't know what to make of it!" Yet this man waxes eloquent over the aesthetics of the spectroscope, and the wonderful properties of sound.

If it is true that "scientific men cannot give heed to any phenomena to which they cannot apply the usual scientific methods," let them wait quietly until new conditions are given, under which they can apply the old methods, or discover new ones. It is possible that now and then one may say like Galileo, when a friend suggested to him that Scheiner's eyes must be failing, as he complained of seeing spots on the sun: "Scheiner's eyes are good enough; I have myself watched those spots for some time past." Watched them, but said nothing; because he could not bring the proof that would save him from the jeers of his fellow-astronomers. No doubt science will have enough to do by and by in classifying the new phenomena, in ascertaining their relations to established laws, in furnishing the needed terminology, and so forth.

"There is nothing in the universe except matter and force," says the materialist. "For force read spirit," says the Spiritualist. May it not be that in the nomenclature of the future a word is waiting which shall unite the inner significance of both terms, while yet the truth it stands for shall prove itself something a little different from what is now anticipated by either Spiritualist or materialist? With this safe prophecy I will close.

H. L. B. B.

A STORY OF "INVESTIGATIONS."

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—Some weeks since letters from me were published in your paper which have caused several persons to write to me requesting explanations of certain manifestations and other matters. It will give me pleasure to comply, if you can spare room.

"If these manifestations were not produced by spirits, how will you account for them?" It is often easier to ask than to answer a question. To examine a lump of ore and ascertain that it is not iron, by no means proves it to be gold. A hundredth part of what I have seen of the manifestations would render it impossible for me to doubt their reality; yet invariably there has been something wanting to connect them with the "spirit-land," while just as invariably there has been an earthly coloring. This must generally have been the experience of fair and cool investigators; for an undoubting Spiritualist of twenty years standing is something I have never seen.

The novelty of the manifestations, with their seeming proof of a life beyond the grave, causes many to accept at first what cooler examination renders doubtful. Some sixteen years ago, an article was published in the Worcester Transcript, signed T. W. H. The writer seemed hurt that the public should doubt the manifestations. As a proof that the public erred, he stated that, at a recent seance, "a little tune learned at Fayal, and of course unknown to the others composing the circle, was played, &c." About ten years ago, another article with the same initials was going the rounds, in which the writer asserted that the manifestations produced by the Davenport and others were tricks. I do not agree with the writer, but quote him to show that candid investigation will not produce conviction of the spiritual origin of alleged communications. If of such origin, why do we not, when communications are so common, learn something previously unknown?

It is said that Dr. Kane married one of the Fox sisters; consequently he should understand the modus operandi. He was anxious to reach the North Pole, and, according to the spiritualistic theory, there was nothing to prevent his doing so; why does he not inform Captain Hall of the proper route to the open polar sea? Where do the spirits of sailors go to unlearn their former knowledge? Mrs. Conant substantially admitted, when asked whether the needle of the mariner's compass pointed to the South Pole on being carried south of the equator, that such was the case. If you write to a spirit friend with every circumstance defined, and the answer fixed in your mind, J. V. Mansfield returns answer according to pattern; but if you write mechanically, as it were, or (what is better) simply ask your friend to give you a test without having any particular test in your mind, the answer invariably comes something like this: "Dear S., I was glad to learn that you still think of me, but I am very weak, and cannot control the medium so as to give you the required test; but if you will write again, perhaps I can do better." Ask Foster to show you the red letters on his arm; in return he will ask you to think of some strong-minded spirit, then to touch the first initial on a card alphabet. Upon doing so, very likely the correct initials will appear; but if you happen to forget a middle initial, as I did, the spirit seems to forget it also. At any rate it fails to appear.

A few years since, while witnessing the manifestations produced by the Eddys, a face appeared at the aperture of the cabinet, remained there perhaps twenty seconds, bowed very calmly, then retired. To me the face seemed to belong to a man of about sixty years of age, and was very peculiar in appearance, and one that I should have readily recognized anywhere. My wife, sitting at my right, insisted that it was the face of one of the "Brothers;" while an enthusiastic individual at my left sprang to his feet, exclaiming, "That was my Uncle Bill!" naming a person well known to the rest of the company, none of whom, however, recognized him. I would call Mrs. Andrews' attention to this last phase. The sceptic will perhaps pronounce the whole a trick of the dark circle; but to such I would say that I have taken an accordion in my left hand, the noonday sun shining full upon it, have seen it stretch out to the full length of the bellows horizontally, and play tunes in a very lively manner without visible fingers being nearer the keys than my own, at the valve end of the bellows. In my opinion, there is no other subject so deserving of thorough investigation as these manifestations; but, to investigate fairly, reliable mediums must be found who are willing to submit to reasonable requirements. This is not often the case.

Yours truly,
JAMES EMERSON.

HOLYOKE, Mass., Sept. 1, 1872.

SCIENTIFIC MEN AND OLD LADIES.

EVANSTON, Ill., Aug. 18, 1872.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Dear Sir,—I don't want to be always talking in meeting, but I do want to say a word about scientific men and prayer. I have had my eye pretty closely on scientific men for twenty-five or thirty years. I had my faith in them early shaken, and in this way.

My mother, my grandmother, and my great-grandmother—all excellent and venerable women—taught me that the moon had great influence upon the weather. They were weatherwise, and, as I found by actual observation, could predict the changes from foul to fine, from rain to shine, with very tolerable accuracy. One day, I learned with profound astonishment that scientific men utterly scorned the notion that the moon affected the weather. I was not ten years old; but I doubted the scientific men from that moment. It was not long since that I saw the report of a very learned paper, written by a French academican, I think, setting forth that the moon in some of its phases and changes does undoubtedly affect the wind currents and the cloud formations. Of course, it was evident that the three old ladies were from fifty to seventy-five years ahead of the scientific men.

Again, these three old ladies all taught their girls that the character of children was lastingly influenced by the condition of the mother during pregnancy. Soon after I was married, I mentioned this theory to a learned medical professor, and he laughed me to scorn. But last autumn a medical convention which met in Chicago spent much time in propounding this same thing as among the latest of medical discoveries, and finally urged it upon the attention of married women as a matter of the greatest importance to the welfare of future generations. You see the old ladies were ahead again.

Now, all these three old ladies were devout believers in the efficacy of prayer, and could all tell very wonderful things which had happened in their lives as the results of it. So, when the scientific men scoff at prayer, I only smile and say: "Twenty-five years from now, gentlemen, you will get up just about abreast of the old ladies; and then you will begin to learn what prayer can do!"

I do not deny that scientific men know a good many things about matters which have come under their notice, and which they have really cared to investigate; but I shall never trust them about the matter of prayer till I see some evidence that they know more about it experimentally than at present they appear to.

Yours for the love of truth,
CAROLINE F. CORBIN.

INDEX TRACTS

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or Representative Passages from the Index, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—Ten Cents. (New Edition.)

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents concepts of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no able, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of figures, facts, and interesting statistics. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist, in appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution?" Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single Copies Ten Cents; Six Copies Fifty Cents; Twelve Copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly religious treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, contains in full the Call for the Cincinnati Convention of the "National Reform Association," which proposes to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution,—the list of its most prominent supporters,—and a full exposure of the dangerous and revolutionary character of the movement. PRICE—Single copies, Five Cents; Twelve copies, Fifty Cents.

Also, The Bible Argument Against Woman Stated and Answered from a Bible Standpoint, a pungent pamphlet by A. J. GROVER, is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

Address, THE INDEX,
Drawer 88, TOLEDO, OHIO.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1878, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA;" by C. D. B. Mills, on the question, "DOES RELIGION REPRESENT A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A PERISHABLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY;" together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucetta Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Seaver, Alexander Lock, and others. Price, 35 cents; in packages of five or more, 25 cents each.

The ANNUAL REPORTS for 1864, 1869, 1870, and 1871 (at 25 cents each), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), Rev. W. H. Channing's essay on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA" (30 cents), Col. T. W. Higginson's essay on "THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS" (20 cents), and an essay by W. J. Potter, on "REASON AND REVELATION" (10 cents)—all published through the Association—can also be obtained as above.

WM. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

EDUCATIONAL.

A YOUNG LADY WILL BE RECEIVED INTO the family of an experienced High School Teacher, to be educated with a niece. Also, a boy of about twelve years, as study companion to a nephew. Special advantages afforded for the study of languages. For terms, etc., please address

MISS E. J. LEONARD,
WINNETKA, ILLINOIS.

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy,

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY IN ST. LOUIS, MO.

It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of Speculative Philosophy in all its departments.

Terms of Subscription.

Two dollars per volume; single number, 50 cents. Vols. I. and II., bound in one volume in muellin, will be sent post-paid by mail for $5.00. Vol. III., Vol. IV., and Vol. V. in muellin, $3.00 each.

All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor,

WM. T. HARRIS,
Box 2338, St. Louis, Mo.

110-161cow.

$5 to $20 per day. Agents wanted. All claims on working paper, with full title, name, place, and date, will be paid more money at once. Particulars in. Address O. G. Johnson & Co., Portland, Maine.

Capital, $100,000.

Shares, $100.

OFFICERS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, President.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Vice President.
P. H. BATESON, Secretary.
A. E. MACOMBER, Treasurer.

DIRECTORS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
ASA K. BUTTS, New York, N. Y.
EDWARD B. HOLLOWAY, Boston, Mass.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Toledo, O.
A. E. MACOMBER, " "
CALVIN CONE, " "
EDWARD BISSELL, " "
P. H. BATESON, " "

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo,	O.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	"	"	Fifteen	1,500
C. CONE,	"	"	"	1,000
EDWARD BISSELL,	"	"	"	1,000
F. E. ABBOT,	"	"	Forty	4,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	"	"	Ten	1,000
GUIDO MARK,	"	"	"	1,000
P. H. BATESON,	"	"	"	1,000
E. P. BARNETT,	"	"	"	1,000
H. E. HOWE,	"	"	Three	300
W. C. FISK,	"	"	"	300
J. M. RITCHIE,	"	"	"	300
V. KREN,	"	"	"	300
ALANSON WOOD,	"	"	"	300
WILLIAM KRAUS,	"	"	Five	500
J. G. HOLWAY,	"	"	One	100
JOE. E. MARK,	"	"	"	100
C. AUCHARD,	"	"	"	100
ASA K. BUTTS,	New York,	N. Y.,	Thirty	3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Newport,	R. I.,	Two	200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin,	Pa.,	Five	500
OSCO. HOADLY,	Cincinnati,	O.,	Two	200
MISS A. HALL,	Northampton,	Mass.,	One	100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Tonica,	Ill.,	"	100
J. SARGENT,	Painesville,	O.,	"	100
CARL POST,	Monroe,	Mich.,	Three	300
HENRY MILLEN,	Sacramento,	Cal.,	Five	500
L. R. NUNDELL,	Quincy,	Mass.,	One	100
J. L. WHITING,	Boston,	"	"	100
LOUIS BRISTOL,	Croydon,	N. H.,	"	100
J. E. SUTTON,	Olathe,	Kan.,	"	100
SAM T. DUREEE,	"	"	"	100
J. M. HADLEY,	"	"	"	100
S. L. HILL,	Florence,	Mass.,	Ten	1,000
W. H. SPRINGER,	Haverhill,	"	Two	200
JOE. P. BARNETT,	Boston,	"	"	200
E. W. WEAIR,	La Grange,	Ind.,	"	200
FRANK FRATHER,	Wellesville,	Mass.,	Five	500
B. F. DINSMORE,	New York,	N. Y.,	Two	200
J. T. DICKINSON,	Middlefield,	Mass.,	Fourteen	1,400
W. J. POTTER,	New Bedford,	Mass.,	Three	300
G. C. GATTE,	Kendallville,	Ind.,	"	300
W. C. GATTE,	Boston,	Mass.,	"	300
MISS M. C. FARRIN,	Dover,	N. H.,	One	100
MRS. E. EMMERSON,	"	"	"	100
W. H. DOWNEY,	Birmingham,	Ala.,	"	100
B. B. SMITH,	Lansing,	Mich.,	"	100
R. B. SMITH,	Warren,	Pa.,	"	100
W. C. RUSSEL,	Ithaca,	N. Y.,	"	100
WM. CLARK,	Toledo,	O.,	Three	300
C. L. SMITH,	"	"	One	100
J. N. LYMAN,	Cincinnati,	O.,	Twenty	2,000
L. G. FELCH,	Monroe Centre,	Mass.,	One	100
A. FOLSON,	Boston,	Mass.,	Three	300
L. O. BARR,	Colebrook,	Conn.,	One	100
E. E. SWEALL,	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	500
ELIZABETH WRIGHT,	"	"	"	500
E. B. WARD,	Detroit,	Mich.,	Twenty	2,000
A. D. WILT,	Dayton,	O.,	One	100
S. S. BOWEN,	Keokuk,	Iowa,	"	100
WM. JONES,	Peekskill,	N. Y.,	"	100
S. H. DAVIS,	Oskaloosa,	Iowa,	"	100
J. H. YORK,	Dover,	N. H.,	"	100
JOE. HAYES,	"	"	"	100
G. P. FOLSON,	"	"	"	100
"A FRIEND,"	"	"	"	100
MRS. H. E. PERKINS,	"	"	"	100
WILLIAM GREEN,	Boston,	Mass.,	Two,	200
"A FRIEND,"	Orange,	N. J.,	One,	100
D. B. STEEDMAN,	Lowell,	Mass.,	"	100
MRS. E. W. CHRISTEN,	Brattleboro,	Vt.,	"	100
C. W. FARMER,	New York, N. Y.,	"	"	100
EDW. M. DAVIS,	Kelly's Island, O.,	"	Two	200
MRS. LUCETTA MOTT,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	"	One	100
MISS M. A. WRIGHT,	Jersey City, N. J.,	"	"	100
A. S. BROWN,	Worcester, Mass.,	"	"	100
EDWIN BROWN,	"	"	"	100
B. P. HOLLOWAY,	Boston,	"	Five	500
BENJ. RODMAN,	New Bedford,	Mass.,	Three	300
H. B. CLARK,	"	"	"	300
FRANK J. SCOTT,	Toledo,	O.,	Six	600
M. L. HOLBROOK,	Houston,	Tex.,	Ten	1,000
W. H. BOGARTON,	New York,	N. Y.,	One	100
HENRY H. RICHARDSON,	"	"	"	100
E. G. BURNETT,	"	"	Two	200
J. E. FOLLETT,	Webster,	Mass.,	"	200
JOS. WARRASSE,	Winona,	Minn.,	One	100
T. M. LAMB,	Newton,	N. J.,	"	100
W. H. DYER,	Franklin,	Pa.,	"	100
LOUIS BELLON,	Worcester,	Mass.,	"	100
LEWIS KURTZ,	Prairie du Chien, Wis.,	"	"	100
SAM'L WARRASSE,	Duluth,	Minn.,	"	100
W. L. RATHB,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	"	Two	200
W. EMMERSON,	Augusta,	Kan.,	One	100
C. H. HORSCH,	La Fayette, N. J.,	"	"	100
MISS I. THOMSON,	Amesbury, Mass.,	"	"	100
BENJ. HOLLOWAY,	Boston,	"	"	100
MRS. M. R. VAN HENDELAR,	Dover,	N. H.,	Two	200
MRS. M. R. VAN HENDELAR,	Sandy Spring, Md.,	"	One	100
W. M. STONE,	Washington, D. C.,	"	"	100
WM. ROTCH,	Fall River, Mass.,	"	Two	200
J. WHITAKER,	New Bedford, Mass.,	"	Five	500
S. H. KOPER,	Kerhonkson, N. Y.,	"	One	100
MRS. R. D. FRANCIS,	Boston Highlands, Mass.,	"	Two	200
CLAS. BULLOCK,	New York, N. Y.,	"	One	100
G. H. BRIGGS,	Salem, O.,	"	"	100
J. T. CLARKSON,	Amesbury, Mass.,	"	Two	200
C. W. NEWTON,	Castleton, Ill.,	"	One	100
HENRY KIENT,	Toledo, O.,	"	Two	200
OTTO KLEIN,	"	"	"	200
H. G. NEUBERT,	"	"	Two	200
A. ROBERT,	"	"	One	100
TOLEDO PRINTING Co.,	Detroit, Mich.,	"	Thirty	3,000
T. K. PRICE,	Toledo, O.,	"	Thirty	3,000
	Westminster, Ct.,	"	Two	200

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,
With offices at 143 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 22 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion. It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM W. STYKENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HOLLOWAY, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Rev. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Weston super Mare, Eng.
Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.

ASA K. BUTTS is Advertising and General Agent for the Index Association. All letters to him on business matters should be addressed—"THE INDEX, Drawer 88, Toledo, Ohio."

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription. Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 88, Toledo, Ohio.

New Tracts!

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition.

FIRST SERIES.....No. 1 to No. 20

SECOND SERIES.....No. 21 to No. 40

Editor Series, 50 Cents; Book, 50 Cents.

Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,
19 PINE STREET, BOSTON.

GIVEN AWAY

TO ANY BOOK AGENT.

A $5.00 GREENBACK

AND A SPECIMEN OF THE

GREAT INDUSTRIES

OF THE UNITED STATES.

1300 PAGES AND 500 ENGRAVINGS.

PRINTED IN ENGLISH AND GERMAN.

Written by 30 Eminent Authors, including Horace Greeley and John B. Gough.

We want Agents in every town to solicit orders for this work, on liberal terms. It sells to all classes, and no library should be without it. It is a complete history of all branches of industry, processes of manufactures, etc. No like work ever before published. One agent sold 128 in eight days, another 263 in two weeks. An early application will secure a choice in territory. Full particulars and terms will be sent free, with a specimen of this Great Work, and a $5 Greenback.

[126-161.] J. B. BURR & HYDE, Hartford, Conn.

HALL'S

MAGIC SHADE FIXTURES!

An ingenious arrangement by which a Shade may be rolled down from the top, or raised from the bottom of the window, or both, as may be desired; thus securing PERFECT VENTILATION, GOOD LIGHT, and at the same time COMPLETE PRIVACY in the room.

They are an admirable and cheap substitute for inside Blinds.

Are easily attached to Shades now in use. Are especially adapted for Office and Store Windows.

For sale by dealers in shades generally.

MANUFACTURED BY THE

CHICAGO CURTAIN FIXTURE COMPANY,

101 WEST LAKE ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

[137-181]

F. J. SCOTT, J. H. STOPPLIST,

78 MADISON STREET (Near Boody House), TOLEDO.

[130-181]

Guns for the People.

Breech-Loading Double Guns, $40 to $300. Double-Barrel Shot-Guns, $24 to $150. Single Guns, $3 to $20. Breech-loading and Repeating Rifles, $20 to $100. Revolvers $5 to $25. Pistols, $5 to $25. SEND STAMP FOR PRICE-LIST TO GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, P. O. Box 1279, Pittsburgh, Pa.

N. B.—Army Guns, Revolvers, etc., bought or traded for. [137-187cow]

FOR ENGLISH AND AMERICAN BOOKS of all kinds, send to J. F. HUGGLES, Branson, Mich. [135cow]

The Index.

SUPPLEMENT.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, OCTOBER 5, 1872.

WHOLE NO. 145.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very fully understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
ABRAHAM WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.

COTATIUS BROOKS PROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WESTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHURCH, ROY. CHARLES VORSEY (England), PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), REV. MORDECAI D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

CHRISTIANITY AND FREEDOM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—In your answer to my letter, I understand you to advance three points:

That the authority of Jesus, if he be regarded as simply human, necessarily amounts to very little.

That the question—"Who is the supreme man in religion?"—it is neither possible for us to answer, nor would it be of much consequence if we could answer it.

That "humanity has no centre;" that the "distinction between the individual centre and the human centre is a pure illusion."

1. One word before considering these points. You speak of my "admissions," but I have made no admissions; I have simply stated my view and defined my terms. I do not hold this view because I am a Unitarian Christian, but I am a Unitarian Christian because I hold this view. And I profess to speak not as an advocate, but (according to my ability) as a scientific theologian. I distinctly claim my view to be scientific, the recognition by my mind of the facts of the case within my range of vision. What is science but the recognition by the mind of the truth within its range, or, objectively, the expression (or systematic expression) of such recognition?

2. And one word more upon our views of freedom. My freedom is a method, as I defined it in my last letter. I cannot see how freedom can be anything more, or where it can get any positive contents except from the truth of things, the reality of Nature. My religion is free in its method, and Christian in its contents. Yours is free in its method, and its contents, I suppose, are the views you advance; but you seem to me sometimes to speak of freedom as though it were both method and contents, and there I am unable to fit your thought with the reality. Perhaps you can enlighten me here.

3. As to your first point, let me be explicit for my part. I regard Jesus as a man, liable to error and sin, and in his actual life not without error and sin; for it is simply inconceivable to me that any one subject to human conditions should be free from error or sin. In the New Testament, there are some things recorded of Jesus which perplex me, and some whose rightfulness my conscience questions. How far this is due to my own shortsightedness, how far to the men through whom we know Jesus, and how far to Jesus himself, I find it hard to judge. The final reason which convinces me that he was not without error and sin is that error and sin seem to me among the necessary conditions of our human nature. An absolutely infallible and sinless man is inconceivable to me.

4. With regard to the general thought that none but an infallible authority can amount to much, consider the case of Calvin, for instance. No one ever claimed that Calvin was infallible or sinless; yet his authority in Western Christendom has been so great as to affect and color its religious life very deeply for more than two centuries, and we meet his thought to this day at every turn. I can hardly read a page of THE INDEX, even, without finding him there in the mind of some contributor struggling with his thought. You may say that it is not Calvin, but his ideas come from except from his and others' minds? Calvin's ideas are a part of Calvin; they are the mind of Calvin working on the themes of religion. Other men held similar ideas, but Calvin gathered up, strengthened, knit together, enlarged, fulfilled, and impelled that body of ideas with a power which, except for him, would have been wanting. Calvin added himself to his associates in the faith, his thought to theirs; and from his powerful mind those ideas came newly forged and welded to a strength which without him would have been wanting to them. That power which his thought added to theirs is his authority. With such an instance in view of the influence of a religious thinker whom no one ever claimed to be infallible, I think we ought to pause before we regard such authority as necessarily of slight importance.

5. With regard to the special thought, which Mr. Potter also expressed in his "New Protestantism" (Radical, Sept. 1871), that the authority of Jesus regarded as a man is a mere shadow of the authority once recognized in him, I appeal to the fact,—to the philosophy of the matter, to the personal experience of humanitarian Christians, and to the public experience of those communities where the humanitarian faith in Jesus, or an approach to it, most largely prevails. At first sight, there seems indeed a great superiority in the authority of an absolute and infallible master over the authority of any man, how holy soever. The infallible authority in itself considered, apart from its adaptation to our human nature, is vastly greater than any human authority can be. But when we consider it in its relations with our human nature, the case changes. An absolute authority overruling my reason and conscience has indeed power over what is left of me, these being extinguished; but freely recognized authority, once rooted in my reason and conscience, hence rules the rest of me. If the absolute authority be also freely recognized and penetrate the mind and conscience, then it is the strongest possible authority; but if it overrule and do not penetrate, then, whatever name we give it, its real power is less than a fallible authority which does so penetrate. That is to say, there are two great questions here: first, what is the power of the authority considered in itself—second, what is its power considered in its relations with human nature, what its power to penetrate the human heart? The faith in Jesus as Absolute Master formally ascribes to him greater authority; but the humanitarian faith seems to me to give him freer and deeper access to the heart and conscience, for there is more truth of nature in it. Where it loses in the one respect, it gains in the other. The faith in Jesus as Absolute Master bars his entrance to the human heart, while the humanitarian faith in him brings us into more intimate, direct, and fruitful relations with him.

When I was a boy, I regarded Jesus as Absolute Master on the authority of others; i. e., I really had faith in my elders, and through them in Jesus. I now regard him as a man, the head of my church and my humanity, my holiest brother and most precious helper, and that on personal knowledge and with direct faith; yet his authority over me now, though formally less absolute, is in reality much greater than before, because it has penetrated my mind and conscience and possesses me there. I believe that a process not wholly unlike this has been going on in Christendom, and that the faith of men in Jesus—originally free and direct and then most powerful, but afterwards lessened in reality though formally heightened—has since Luther's day been growing in freedom, directness, and power; and I venture to prophesy that, when the process of thought shall be fairly worked out, and Jesus shall stand in his true place in human history and in the human heart, we shall see (or the future will see) an age of Christian faith never seen before. I think that our humanitarian faith, however it may compare with any other faith, has certainly now enough in it for a Christian character, and a Christian church, and a Christian humanity, such as have never yet been seen under any other phase of faith. If we degenerate from the Fathers, the fault will be our own, not that of the faith we profess.

6. From my own experience and observation, I believe the humanitarian faith in Jesus to be a powerful and operative faith very deeply affecting the character and life; and I appeal to a comparison between it and the most Orthodox faith in him. Take, for instance, Dr. Furness and Dr. Bartol on the one side, and Father Hecker and Archbishop Manning on the other. As everybody knows, the two former are humanitarians, the two latter among the stiffest of Romanists. I appeal to the writings of these four men, and ask whether the authority of Jesus, the actual influence and power of his spirit over theirs, be any less with the former than with the latter? I think it to be more. I doubt if you, or Mr. Potter, can think it less. And even if you should think it to be less, you must recognize that it is not a slight or shadowy influence, but apparently the most powerful of all earthly interests with them. What is true of Dr. Furness and Dr. Bartol in a marked degree is true of multitudes of believers in a less degree. Hence I cannot think with you and Mr. Potter that the authority of Jesus, regarded as a man, is necessarily a slight thing. It seems to me among the greatest spiritual influences—perhaps the greatest influence—now at work upon the Western mind. This authority I believe to be helped by free criticism, for by such criticism it is received into the public mind and rooted in it. The competency of the best of witnesses is not above criticism, but established by criticism.

7. The distinction I drew between the authority of Galileo and Jesus was one of contents rather than of kind, except so far as the kind is affected by the contents. An authority in making knives, for instance, is one thing; an authority in astronomy another thing; an authority in religion another thing. There is a scale in the departments of life corresponding to the different parts and faculties of our human nature. Religion having to do with our highest part, our inmost souls, and relating us with eternity, humanity, and God, is our highest interest. The to us greatest religious man is therefore necessarily the chief man of our humanity, because he is our greatest human helper in religion, our greatest interest.

8. Secondly, you hold that we cannot know "the supreme man in religion;" and also that, if we could know him, it would matter little. As to our inability to know absolutely the supreme religious man of humanity, I agree with you, and in my letter I made the proviso, "as far as known to me," or "to us," or the like, some six times, and in my first letter twice. If cross-examined on my exact words, I will put it—"as far as known to me." What is not known to me I can affirm nothing positive about. I can speak only of what I know and think, and not of what is beyond my vision. The proof that Jesus is the holiest man known to me I find, apart from the general tradition of Christendom, in the New Testament, of which he is substantially the author; that is to say, he is the chief man behind it, the chief original and inspiring source of it. I recognize the New Testament as the holiest book I know, containing the holiest thought and manifesting the holiest life of any book, word, action, or other expression of the human spirit, present or past, of men living or dead, that I have ever met with, including of course my own consciousness of myself; and my range of observation and study, however narrow, has not been limited by dogmatic lines. This assertion about Jesus and the New Testament is not a "random assertion," but the result of all my observation, study, and thought, such as they have been. Nor is it "dogmatic," for dogmatism is setting up a human dictum in the place of the truth, not a simple statement of one's thought with an appeal to the truth to support it. To state plainly what we see and think, appealing to the truth to support us, is not dogmatic but scientific.

9. Again, I cannot agree with you that we know very little of Jesus. We do not know very much about the incidents of his life, about the particulars of his movements, the chronology, geography, and so on, of his life; but I think we know a great deal about him, and that the most essential part. I feel inclined to say that we know more of him than we do of any other man whatsoever, because there is more of him to be known. From one drama of Shakespeare, for instance, I could learn more of him than I could of even so good a man as Goldsmith from a thousand of his dramas, if he had written so many, because there is so much more of Shakespeare to be known. So through the New Testament we learn a vast deal of Jesus, enough to affect the personal heart most deeply, as it has in fact affected it, and through the personal heart the public heart, as the fact also proves; enough to deepen, purify, and uplift human nature itself, and all humanity, to a height almost divine.

[From the Cincinnati Enquirer.]

10. And the question who is the holiest man is by no means so unimportant as the question who is the first man. The latter is merely a question of precedence of time, and can have no moral meaning; but the question who is the holiest man is full of moral meaning. It means, Who is my greatest human helper in my dearest interest? For since humanity is one, the human heart one, and the truth of religion one, I may through faith in him and sympathy with him share his excellence. Your religion concerns "ideas, not persons," you say; mine concerns both ideas and persons. By what right do you wipe persons out of nature? Are not human persons, and is not human history and humanity a part of nature? How do ideas come to us except through the human personality,—our own personalities, or others? Some come to us originally through our own minds, most indirectly through others' minds. In every department of thought and life we use the help of other persons. You, for instance, are helped by the person Darwin to certain ideas, and by others also whom you regard as "superior" persons. It is so with all of us, except with those eccentric characters who insist upon being "fools in their own right;" and it is so in every department of life, with an importance increasing as we rise in the scale. Do you deny this importance of persons in religion? Is Theodore Parker nothing to you? Has he never been anything to you? In religion, it seems to me, this help is not only most precious in degree, but peculiarly personal in kind; for religion, as I have said, is not only the vision of God, man, and eternity, but the disposition of our souls toward God, man, and eternity,—something personal in us, which can only be attained by us through our own innate personal holiness, or through faith in and sympathy with men holier than we are, and most of all with the holiest man known to us. My faith in Jesus is but the extension to its widest and highest reach of that faith in our neighbors and fellow-men which we all practise daily in all parts of our lives—which you yourself, for instance, practise with the persons associated with you for the advance of "liberty and light." Yet it is a very real and operative faith, and it is based upon my recognizing Jesus as the head of my church, of my humanity; that is, of all beings present to my conscience, he stands next to God.

11. Hence I must regard it as a very pertinent question when I ask you to show me, if you can, one who by the grace of God and his own holiness stands in the same relation to Jesus that Jesus stands in to me; that is, one superior to Jesus, if that be possible. I still ask the question of you and of all other men in good faith and decided earnest. I think the question who is the holiest man known to be one of the supreme religious questions; for our holiest brother is not only our greatest earthly helper in our greatest interest, but, since we know God best through the human soul, he is also the best interpreter of God to us.

12. Thirdly, you deny humanity to have a centre, and affirm that there is no human centre except the individual centre. My figure of the centres laid me open, I suppose, to your extension of it to Christians revolving like satellites about Jesus. But the relation between two human souls is not thus mechanical; it is an inward relation of faith and sympathy, and so your astronomical figure is inapplicable. You seem in doubt of what I mean by "human centre," or "centre of humanity." I do not know that the figure is a happy one. I mean that, since there is a unity in humanity, in the human heart, and in the Truth, the greatest person or the greatest heart of all humanity must necessarily be the greatest centre of influence on all kindred, all human hearts; or actually the greatest soul known to humanity must be the centre, the central influence, the central spiritual force of humanity. This seems to me to follow necessarily from the oneness or solidarity of mankind, the "brotherhood" of man. I had always supposed that you recognized this oneness of mankind as a fact, and do not feel sure that you deny it, though that was my first impression from your language. If humanity be merely an aggregation of unrelated individuals, then there can be only individual centres; but if these individuals be related, then to the unity resulting from their relations there must be a centre, or centres. If human nature itself be one, and mankind one, then it seems to me there must be a centre of humanity. Ideas relate men, you may say, and centre them; but persons also, I think. Men are religiously related with each other, with a resulting unity and order of association, according to their inward vision and holiness. Why would you go to hear Mr. Emerson on Immortality rather than Mr. Smith or Mr. Brown? Because you have more faith in his inward vision than in theirs. That power of his makes Mr. Emerson the greatest living centre of influence and spiritual thought to a number of souls. His soul is better than theirs in some directions; and, since they are of kindred nature with him, they turn toward him with sympathy and faith, and are made better by him. So any man of deep, pure, or large nature is a centre of influence to others. Where shall we draw the limit to such possible influence? Is there any necessary limit of time? As soon as a man dies, does he belong to the "dead past"? Is Theodore Parker one of the dead past? We can draw no limit of time to spiritual influence. What is passed into oblivion is indeed passed from our conscious recognition; but all that is within our reach is living for us. Can we draw any limit of number? Number has nothing to do with it. Kinship of nature is the one condition. "One touch of nature makes the whole world kin;" and the man whose heart is fullest, deepest, holiest of all mankind is by that very fact necessarily the whole world's helper, the helper of all mankind, if only he be brought within their reach.

13. From the fact that men are one in nature and in interest, and that the truth is one, spring all the associated institutions of mankind. The just ordering of each of these institutions is evidently the best man at the head of it, and the rest related according to their worth, that thus each and all, giving and receiving, may grow up together in thought and action to the greatest perfection possible. All actual institutions are imperfect embodiments of this idea. And at the head of these institutions is the religious association of mankind, the church,—using that word in its largest sense, to include every religious organization, Christian and otherwise. The just order of such an association is obviously the best men at the head of it, that all may receive of their fullness. So far Mr. O. B. Frothingham will go with me, and Mr. Higginson, and Mr. Weiss, and perhaps you yourself. I go one step farther, and say the best man at the head of it. Since the human heart is one and the truth of religion one, I think there must be such a best or holiest man in the nature of things, whether we are able to recognize him or not. The actual question is, Who is the holiest man known to us, the head of our church, of our humanity? The same spiritual judgment which discerns the holiest men, Buddha and the rest, seeks after the holiest man. The same discrimination which, in each country and race, has sought out the holiest man known there will, I am convinced, when the whole world is open to our vision, seek out in the whole world the holiest man known. Why stop when we have found the five or ten holiest men within our view? We must go farther and seek out the holiest one. Nor is the search unfruitful, for the comparison will reveal them and him to us more perfectly. I do not profess to know these foreign saints as I know those nearer home. I chiefly know them indirectly. I rejoice in them and their excellence. Such acquaintance as I have with them, however, has served to brighten to my mind the personality of Jesus. It has heightened the power of his character over me to see it beside the mighty characters of the other religious leaders of mankind. The religious association of Christendom, the Christian church, has hitherto had for its basis chiefly the Western world. The advance of international intercourse, now so great and growing, is rapidly bringing us into intimate and almost neighborly relations with the entire globe. The question has hitherto been rather who of our Western hemisphere is the head of the church and of humanity, though I imagine the former times knew more of the Eastern religions than we give them credit for. But the question is now put to us more distinctly than ever before, Who of all this globe is the holiest man known? The Eastern saints are now knocking at our hearts. If by the grace of God any of them should be superior to Jesus, supposing that to be possible; if the faith of any reaches deeper into the human heart, or rises nearer to God and heaven—then would he be, by God's ordaining and his own worth, the head of the church, and Jesus his younger brother. To refuse to recognize him as such would be fighting against God, and to my mind against Jesus. It is evidently our pious and our Christian duty to give these brethren from the East a hospitable and reverent welcome; and the general judgment of mankind, when it shall have become familiarly acquainted with them, will accord them their just and natural order in the church of humanity, their rightful seat in the kingdom of God upon earth. The general judgment of scholars in this department is, I believe, that Jesus transcends all the rest, and that his religion is the divinest of all, with which judgment my own comparatively slight acquaintance with the subject agrees. Upon fuller acquaintance, which I trust we shall all make, our judgment will have more basis, and hence more weight. But the practical question for each one is, Who is to me the holiest of mankind, my greatest brother in my greatest interest, the deepest interpreter to me of my own heart and of the heart of man, the divinest interpreter of God to me? For me, that one is Jesus Christ.

I am truly yours,

FRANCIS T. WASHEURN.

MILTON, Mass., March 22, 1872.

Most of you are probably familiar, to some extent, at least, with the controversy which has recently sprung up concerning the efficacy of prayer. I am impelled to take part in it, not because I feel that there can be any serious doubt or uncertainty in your minds as to my views on the general subject of prayer. I have discussed it too often and too elaborately, already, to make any new treatment of it necessary for the elucidation either of my opinions or my practice. I take up the question again, now, for the reason that I think in the discussion thus far it has been singularly misapprehended and perverted. And I am bound to say that I think this is true of both parties in the controversy.

Let me explain this before we go any further. In the July number of the Contemporary Review, an anonymous letter was published, with an introduction by Prof. Tyndall, proposing a plan for "determining the value of prayer to the Deity." The author of the letter, after classifying the various objects for which supplication is made, suggests that a fair test of the value of the whole would be to take the case of "prayers for the sick," and by actual experiment, applied to a large number of instances, and extending over a considerable length of time, determine whether there is any appreciable influence upon the quickness of recovery and rate of mortality among a given class of patients, that can be unquestionably attributed to the interference of prayer. The specific proposition was this: "That one single ward or hospital, under the care of first-rate physicians and surgeons—containing certain numbers of patients afflicted with those diseases which have been best studied, and of which the mortality rates are best known, whether the diseases are those which are treated by medical or surgical remedies—should be, during a period of not less, say, than three or five years, made the object of special prayer by the whole body of the faithful, and that, at the end of that time, the mortality rates should be compared with the past rates, and also with that of other leading hospitals, similarly well managed, during the same period."

As was probably expected, this proposition was received by the professedly religious world with demonstrations of horror and disgust. It at once gave rise to a many-voiced theological tirade against the reckless impiety of modern scientific men, and their inherent stupidity in matters of religion. The excitement was still further augmented by the publication, in the Fortnightly Review for August, of an article by Francis Galton, entitled, "Statistical Inquiry into the Efficacy of Prayer."

Mr. Galton goes much further than Mr. Tyndall's anonymous friend. He says: "I had the prayers for the sick any notable effect, it is incredible but that the doctors who are always on the watch for such things should have observed it, and added their influence to that of the priests toward obtaining them for every sick man." He regards "the universal habit of the scientific world to ignore the agency of prayer" as "a very important fact," and seems to think it not worth while, on the whole, to institute new experiments for the purpose of settling the question. Indeed, he is of the opinion that it has been already settled by a test similar to that which is now proposed. He instances numerous classes of persons who are regularly prayed for in the churches, persons for whom health, length of life, wisdom, and the like, are asked of the Deity, and who, nevertheless, are shown by statistics to be no better off in these respects than other men.

There can be no doubt that Mr. Galton expresses, in the general drift of his reasoning, the conclusions of scientific men on this matter. When Mr. Tyndall says that "if such be attainable, it is certainly desirable to have clearer notions than we now possess of the action of 'Providence' in physical affairs," no reader of his works will for a moment imagine that Tyndall himself feels any great necessity for clearing up his notions on the point in question. For, eleven years ago, he had already recorded his "thoughts on prayer and natural law." "One by one natural phenomena," he said, "have been associated with their proximate causes; and the idea of direct personal volition mixing itself in the economy of nature is retreating more and more." * * * * * Nature asserts that, without a disturbance of natural law, quite as serious as the stoppage of an eclipse, or the rolling of the St. Lawrence up the Falls of Niagara, no act of humiliation, individual or national, could call one shower from heaven, or deflect toward us a single beam of the sun. Those, therefore, who believe that the miraculous is still active in nature may, with perfect consistency, join in our periodic prayers for fair weather, and for rain; while those who hold that the age of miracles is past will refuse to join in such petitions. * * * * * Assuming the efficacy of free prayer to produce changes in external nature, it necessarily follows that natural laws are more or less at the mercy of man's volition, and no conclusion founded on the assumed permanence of those laws would be worthy of confidence." It will be seen at once that this reasoning applies to health and disease, as well as to all other physical affairs which are supposed to be more or less dependent upon the special action of Providence. I cannot, therefore, regard it as unjustifiable inference that Professor Tyndall did not expect to gain any new light by the proposed experiment, and that it was not suggested with the idea that the religious world would seriously enter into it.

Nevertheless, the plan is not open, in one view of it at least, to the main objection which has been urged against it. It has been said that prayer grows out of the paternal and filial relations between God and man; that man petitions for and God grants benefits, as a child would ask and a father give; and that to propose to test the power of prayer by actual experiment, the results of which are to be carefully noted and tabulated, is as absurd as the proposition would be to test the efficacy of filial affection by a given number of children asking their parents for certain specific favors, and the effect of this asking having been duly observed and registered, comparing the subsequent condition of these children with that of those who had not importuned their parents for such favors, but had trusted to parental affection for conferring all that was needful. This is certainly a very striking and taking way of exhibiting what is conceived to be the absurdity of the proposition. But plausible as it is, it is superficial and not to the point. It may be valid against the plan of procedure. For it is hardly conceivable that any parent, if he were aware of it, would like to be made the subject of such an experiment, or that he would regard the undertaking of any such as evidence of much filial affection on the part of his child, or that he would be likely to grant the requests made for such a purpose; all of which applies with even greater force to God, who cannot be supposed to be ignorant of any collateral object which those who pray to him may have. But while this objection shows the inappropriateness of the method of the proposed experiment, it does not show that the end sought to be obtained thereby is illegitimate. It is asserted that physical results proceed from the special providences contemplated by the orthodox theory of supplicatory prayer. This assertion is in itself tantamount to saying that the efficacy of prayer is properly the subject of external observation; it produces effects in the physical world which may be registered, computed, classified, and made the basis of calculation. The man of science may not be able to produce these effects at will and directly, any more than he can produce, by his interference, any of the comical phenomena; but, when they are produced, they certainly fall within the province of scientific investigation. There can, as it seems to me, be no rational objection to a scientific estimate of the value and correctness of the orthodox theory of prayer.

Another objection (immediately connected with the foregoing) to the proposed test, is, that it presupposes a certain constraint exercised upon God. The Spectator, in reply to Mr. Tyndall, says: "We should be much surprised to learn that any man who had really given up his mind to thoughts of this kind at all had ever regarded his prayer as a sort of petty dictation to God, the effect of which might be measured like a constituent's pressure on his representative in Parliament, by the influence it exerted on the issue." If the writer of this language had been in the habit of carefully reading his Bible, he would certainly not be surprised to learn of instances of this kind. There are plenty of them to be found, especially in the Old Testament. The most notable, perhaps, is that of Elijah, who expressly proposes to Ahab to test whether Jehovah, or the god of the prophets of Baal, be the true one, by an answer to prayer. If the false prophets could make their god kindle a fire upon the altar, he would admit him to be the true one; if they failed, and he, Elijah, succeeded in making Jehovah kindle a fire, Ahab must admit him to be the true God. So if the writer had been tolerably familiar with history, he would not have had far to seek for instances of like character. One of the most famous is the prayer of Luther for the recovery of his friend Melancthon. The reformer went so far in his dictation in the case, as to say that if God did not hear him and restore his friend, he would have nothing more to do with him. Luther had a faith in the efficacy of prayer which it would be somewhat rare to find in these days. He did not hesitate even to declare that it required only that he should sincerely ask for the destruction of the world, to precipitate the advent of the last day. If this be true, we may be thankful that he did not feel himself moved to ask. But, whether true or not, it is sufficient to show that the writer in the Spectator might have been better informed.

The misapprehension of which I complained in the beginning, and which, as it seems to me, has vitiated the whole discussion, so far as I have been able to show it, has arisen from the fact that prayer has been limited to supplication, to the petition for special benefits, whether physical or spiritual.

As regards the solicitation of special physical good from God, of whatever sort it may be—whether it relate to health, length of life, recovery from disease, to the weather, the fertility of the soil, to success in war or in peace, to individuals or nations, or what not—I believe it cannot be shown that God ever has done, in consequence of prayer, what he would not have done had the prayer been omitted. So far as the prayer, in any instance, has been accompanied or followed by greater or different activity on the part of man—that is to say by a kind or degree of activity which he would not have exercised had he not prayed—the result may have been different from what it would have been had no prayer been offered. But the difference in the activity cannot be proved to be the work of God, specially intervening for the benefit of the suppliant, or of those for whom he interceded. The strong desire which culminates in the burst of supplication may, and doubtless often does, produce increase of effort, or a modification of the means toward the attainment of the wished-for end; but this is a result which is explainable without resorting to the hypothesis of special Divine interference.

So far as physical events are concerned, we may confidently say that there can be no special superhuman interference with their orderly succession. The order of nature is nothing more nor less than the expression of God's perfect wisdom. Its obedience to immutable law is nothing but the harmony of God's will with his work. Whatever changes man is able to effect in nature, he produces them only in accordance with law. He increases his dominion over the outward world only by increasing his knowledge of the laws that govern it. It is mere declamation to say, as a noted Unitarian preacher does, that "every genuine prayer is a positive force in the universe of things," unless he means to say that such prayer is naturally and inevitably transmuted into action on the part of him who offers it. But even in this case, how can it be asserted that "every prayer, in proportion to the force that is in it," tends to produce the "outward, visible result which it contemplates"? The fall of rain, for instance, is undoubtedly attributable to the action of physical forces; but what physical action of man tends to produce rain? So the destruction of crops by hail, or of a vessel by a storm at sea, is the effect of purely physical agents; but what can man do, physically, to resist the hail-storm or the force of the ocean tornado? His physical strength is as weak as the breath of his supplication; both, in the face of such catastrophes, are equally impotent. All history and all experience teach us that Nature knows no difference between praying and cursing. She is as impassive to the one as to the other. She is not more favorable to the pious man than to the impious. Her sun shines upon the one with the same benignity as upon the other, and her earthquakes engulf the one just as readily as the other. In other words, she puts no premium upon piety. It has no advantage with her, except that which comes from obedience to her laws; and impiety no disadvantage, except that which follows upon disobedience.

And so if we turn to petitions for spiritual gifts and blessings, so far as they are to be considered free gifts, and not the result of labor and effort, we shall find the case not different. And yet the common impression is, even among enlightened people, that whatever may be said against prayer for merely physical good, no valid objection can be raised against petitioning for good that is spiritual. No mistake could be greater. The attainment of spiritual good is not less subject to unvarying law than the acquisition of that which is physical. I might just as well ask God to come in and adorn these naked walls with glorious pictures, such as no Raphael or Angelo ever conceived, as to ask him to come and adorn your soul or mine with any transcendent virtue of which we are bare. God cannot make me kind or generous, forgiving, loving, or truthful, if I am none of these, unless I seek day by day and hour by hour, with all the power that is in me, to become so. Outside of me no one can do this. Omnipotence is unequal to the task. Increasing in virtue is personal growth; greening from within outwards, not by addition from without; the flush upon the cheek of beauty, which comes from healthy blood, and not from the application of cosmetics. As with physical effects, the intense and burning desire for spiritual perfection, which cannot contain itself in silence, but pours itself forth in words addressed to God, may, and does undoubtedly, in many cases, contribute toward the consummation; but it does this by bringing the aim more clearly to view, enabling the mind to grasp it more definitely; by deepening and vivifying the inward life through contemplation of ideal holiness, and thus quickening and strengthening the natural energies to the attainment thereof. But in all this it would be vain to seek for miraculous interposition of the Deity. There is no special providence in it, no variation from the law which governs mind as surely as gravity governs matter.

In the sense, then, in which God is supposed to answer prayer by interference, miraculous interposition, or special providences of any sort, whether the good solicited be physical or spiritual, I declare now, as I have done repeatedly before, that I do not believe that He does answer prayer at all. I believe, further, that in so far as prayer is limited to supplication, petition, solicitation, to asking for something, to importuning God to do that which he otherwise would not do, it is essentially irrational, and will fall more into disuse the more enlightened and the more truly religious men become. Long ago Milton saw the futility of prayer of this sort, when he said—

"If by prayer

Incessant I could hope to change the will
Of him who all things can, I would not cease
To weary him with my assiduous cries;
But prayer against His absolute decree
No more avails than breath against the wind
Blown eddying back on him that breathes it forth;
Therefore to His great bidding I submit."

But, with the doing away of this lowest form of prayer, we are far from abolishing prayer itself. All the higher forms are left and will forever remain. They are inseparable from pure religion. Wherever the living and perfect God is conceived and felt as the author of all that is; wherever men recognize that, however they may conceive it, there is a Divine Life in the Universe that is not exhausted or expressed by the things which can be seen and felt; wherever the conviction becomes settled within them that they are participants in a bounty that did not come by chance, and enfolded in a providence that is as pervasive as light and as universal; that they are heirs of a life of the ages which has not flowed without a purpose; that for them is all the glory and beauty of external nature, so far as they can grasp and take it in; that all the dearest affections of private life, and all the beneficence that flows from public good-will, are but the expression of an immeasurable, infinite goodness that pulses throughout the world,—there the prayerful soul will burst forth in thanksgiving and adoration to Him in whom all men and all things "live and move and have their being." And wherever men are conscious of moral weakness, of sinful desires and degrading appetites, of a wrong disposition, of wickedness in deed, and are oppressed with a sense of their own unworthiness, they will humble themselves before the ideal holiness of God and seek relief in prayerful confession of their sins. And so, when the ideal virtue, truth, beauty, reveals itself to men's enchanted vision, they will aspire toward it, and mounting upon the wings of prayer vow themselves in solemn consecration to its service. But, more than all, with growth in true religion, the prayerful spirit will enter into men's lives, into their daily work, and into their constant thought; not the spirit of begging and imploration, but of aspiration and endeavor after whatever is wholly fair and true. This is prayer that finds its answer without a miracle, and which yet works wonders continually. When men practise it they pray with their hearts and hands continually. They are workers together with God, and are truthful and reverent always. What boots it that such a man is not wont to pray with moving lips or bended knees! May he not, when he lays himself to rest at night, compose his spirit, and—

"In humble trust his eyelids close
With reverential resignation,
No wish conceived, no thought expressed,
Without a sense of supplication—
A feeling on his soul impressed
That he is weak, yet not unbelieved,
Since in him, round him, everywhere,
Eternal strength and wisdom are!"

IN BELIEVING PRAYER CERTAINLY EFFECTUAL?

[From the New York Daily Witness.]

In the July number of the Contemporary Review there was suggested a method of scientifically determining whether prayers for the recovery of the sick would accomplish or hasten their recovery. The proposition was that, in addition to such general petitions for the sick as are used in the service of the Church of England, special prayer should be made for a course of years for the patients in some one hospital, or in some one ward of a hospital. The statistics of that ward, or of that hospital, continued through a series of years, would clearly show whether the recovery of its patients was more speedy or more thorough than that of sick people elsewhere.

Several editors of religious papers have expressed their indignation at this proposition, and at him who made it; and Rev. Dr. James McCosh, President of Princeton College, has published in the Daily Witness of August 17 a "Reply" to the suggestion above mentioned.

Preferring to pass without comment the misrepresentations contained in this "Reply," and the needless and groundless imputation of ill motives to its author, and to Prof. Tyndall who wrote a note of introduction for him, I pass at once to the substance of the "Reply." Dr. McCosh declares that "the proposal is not consistent with the method and the laws of God's spiritual kingdom."

This objection implies that its author conceives himself clearly to understand what are, and what are not, "the laws of God's spiritual kingdom." Before receiving his dictum, however, before even examining the matter on its own merits, let us see if the Rev. Doctor's position is consistent with itself, and with the well known doctrine of Orthodoxy, of which he is the champion, concerning prayer.

Dr. McCosh, in his "Reply," repeatedly makes mention of the "Word of God," obviously referring to the Bible. The infallible inspiration of that book, and the absolute certainty with which believers may rely on its "promises," are fixed points in the "Princeton Theology," and may rightfully be assumed as parts of the belief of its representative. If the book thus inspired by God for the very purpose of directing our faith and practice really promises that whatever is asked by a concert of believers shall be granted, does not this warrant the use of such prayer for the recovery of particular sick persons, and the expectation of their recovery in consequence of it? Let us look at the precise terms of these infallibly inspired promises.

In Mark xi. 22-24 Jesus—describing the efficacy of faith, and the manner of exercising it, and the appropriate subjects for its exercise—says to his disciples: "What things soever ye desire when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them."

Moreover, Jesus fortified this all-comprehending statement by the specification of a particular case of the intensest improbability—

"Verily, I say unto you, that whosoever shall say unto this mountain (pointing to one which stood in their sight near Bethany), Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea; and shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that those things which he saith shall come to pass; he shall have whatsoever he saith."

The parallel passage in Matthew xxi. 23, says the same thing: "All things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive."

Furthermore, John (xiv. 13) represents Jesus as saying, "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do."

If these declarations are really made to us, as well as to the particular persons then addressed by Jesus, they authorize the confident belief that any believer may have any desire accomplished for him. But the same promise is repeated (Matt. xviii. 19) to a concert of believers—

"Again I say unto you, that if two of you shall agree on earth, as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven."

Does Dr. McCosh mean to say that "the laws of God's spiritual kingdom" forbid the expectation that believing prayer, single or in concert, will now receive that which it asks?

If so, what are those laws? and why, accepting them, does he teach a theory of Scriptural infallibility which they disprove?

If he does not mean that, what does he mean?

The subject of prayer in the case proposed—the recovery of the sick—is not only unexceptionable in itself, but it has the warrant of Scripture, and of the practice of all branches of the Church in all ages.

The only peculiarity in the method suggested in the Contemporary Review is to apply the force of concerted faith, a union of believing prayers, in a case where its success in the cure of disease will be manifest and unquestionable; where the superiority of this method over mere medical and surgical treatment, appearing in the statistics which every hospital keeps for the instruction of its managers, will show the first year a probability, the second year a strong presumption, and the fifth year unquestionable proof, that believing prayer is the effective and practically operative force which the Bible and the Young Men's Christian Associations maintain it to be. How is the effort to show the truth upon this point inconsistent with "the method and the laws of God's spiritual kingdom"? Will Dr. McCosh tell us?

INQUIRER.

Single Copies

OF

THE INDEX FOR 1870,

Containing the following

ESSAYS

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS.

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion	1
What is Free Religion?	2
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions	4
Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential Spirit	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom	7
Sunday Schools	8
Friendship	9
Grief and its Compensation	10
The Hebrew Prophets	11
Capital Punishment	12
Human Ideals	13
The Essence of Religion	14
The Management of Children	15
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian	16
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates (Report from the N. Y. Tribune)	17
The Candle of the Lord	18
Public Opinion	19
Conscience	20
The Pedigree of Man	21
"Following Christ"	22
The Tongue	23
The Golden Age	24
What is Truth?	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams	27
The Sunday Question	28
Motes and Beams	29
The Dove's Departure	30
The Bible in the Public Schools	31
Religious Freedom	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men	33
Noise	34
The Humility of Free Religion	35
Chaos and Cosmos	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion	38
War and Free Religion	39
Religious Revivals	40
Mary and Martha	41
The Ministry of Free Religion	42
Success	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness"	44
Spiritual Beauty	45
The Book of Daniel	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the opportunity which America offers for its development	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Beemelin	49
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana	50
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense	51
M. Wise	52
Sunday—its Uses and Abuses	53
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Puckham	54
Parties and Party Spirit	55
The Future of Religious Organization, as affected by the Spirit of the Age	56
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse	57
Transient and Permanent	58

Back Numbers of the Index!

FOR 1870 AND 1871.

It is no longer possible to furnish a complete file of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address at

Twenty-five Cents a Dozen!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

Address

THE INDEX,

Toledo, Ohio.

BOUND INDEX FOR 1871.—Complete files of THE INDEX for 1871, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $3.50 and 75 cents postage, or sent by express if the postage is not prepaid by the purchaser. Only a limited number can be furnished.

IMPORTANT AND SCHOLARLY WORKS.

FOR SALE BY

Scribner, Welford, & Armstrong,

654 Broadway, New York.

1. TYLOR'S RESEARCHES INTO THE EARLY HISTORY OF MANKIND. 1 Vol., 8vo. $6.00
2. TYLOR'S PRIMITIVE CULTURE: RESEARCHES INTO THE DEVELOPMENT OF MYTHOLOGY, PHILOSOPHY, RELIGION, ART, AND CUSTOM. 2 Vols., 8vo. $12.00
3. MAURICE'S MORAL AND METAPHYSICAL PHILOSOPHY. New and revised edition. 2 very large Vols., 8vo. $9.00
4. UEBERWEG'S SYSTEM OF LOGIC AND HISTORY OF LOGICAL DOCTRINES. Large 8vo. $3.00
5. BEAL'S CATENA OF BUDDHIST SCRIPTURES, from the Chinese. 1 Vol., 8vo. $7.50
6. ALABASTER'S THE WHEEL OF THE LAW. BUDDHISM ILLUSTRATED FROM CHINESE AND OTHER SOURCES. 1 Vol., 8vo. $7.00
7. MAHAPPA'S PROLEGOMENA TO ANCIENT HISTORY. CONTAINING THE INTERPRETATION OF LEGENDS AND INSCRIPTIONS, AND A SURVEY OF OLD EGYPTIAN LITERATURE. 1 Vol., 8vo. $7.00
8. RIG-VEDA—SANCHITA: THE SACRED HYMNS OF THE BRAHMAN. Translated and explained by MAX MÜLLER. 1 Vol., 8vo. $6.35
9. THOMSON'S THE DISCOVERY OF A NEW WORLD OF BEING. 1 Vol., 12mo. $3.00
10. AVESTA: THE RELIGIOUS BOOKS OF THE PARSEES. Translated by BLECK. 1 Vol., 8vo. $10.50
11. SPINOZA, HIS LIFE, CORRESPONDENCE, AND ETHICS. By Dr. WILLIS. 1 large Vol., 8vo. $9.00
12. ZERFF'S SPIRITUALISM AND ANIMAL MAGNETISM. 1 Vol., 12mo. $1.25
13. COBBE'S DARWINISM IN MORALS, AND OTHER ESSAYS. 1 Vol., 8vo. $3.00
14. READLEY'S "WHAT IS TRUTH?" ELEMENTARY AND PRIMARY VIEWS OF RELIGION. 1 Vol., 12mo. $1.25
15. JACCOLLIOT'S THE BIBLE IN INDIA. HINDU ORIGIN OF HEBREW AND CHRISTIAN REVELATION. 1 Vol., 8vo. $3.00
16. STIRLING'S THE SECRET OF HEGEL: BEING THE HEGELIAN SYSTEM IN ORIGIN, PRINCIPLE, FORM, AND MATTER. 3 Vols., 8vo. $14.00
17. GREG'S LITERARY AND SOCIAL JUDGMENTS. New and cheap edition. 1 Vol., 12mo. $2.50
18. GREG'S CREED OF CHRISTENDOM—ITS FOUNDATIONS AND SUPERSTRUCTURE. 1 Vol., 12mo. $2.00
19. CRANBROOK'S THE FOUNDERS OF CHRISTIANITY: OR DISCOURSES ON THE ORIGIN OF CHRISTIANITY. 1 Vol., 12mo. $3.00
20. HENNEL'S INQUIRY CONCERNING THE ORIGIN OF CHRISTIANITY. 1 Vol., 12mo. $1.25
21. HENNEL'S COMPARATIVISM: AN INTRODUCTION TO "PRESENT RELIGION." 1 Vol., 12mo. $1.25
22. VOYSEY'S THE SLING AND THE STONE. Liberal Sermons. Vols. III. & IV. in 12mo each. $3.75
23. VOYSEY'S DEFENCE ON CHARGES OF HERESY. $5.00
24. FEUERBACH'S ESSENCE OF CHRISTIANITY. Translated by KRAMER. 1 Vol., 12mo. $2.00
25. BUECHNER'S FORCE AND MATTER: EMPIRICO-PHILOSOPHICAL STUDIES, INTELLIGIBLY RENDERED. 1 Vol., 12mo. $3.75
26. SUTTON'S FAITH AND SCIENCE. 1 Vol., 12mo. $4.50
27. COBBE'S HOURS OF WORK AND PLAY. 12mo. $3.00
28. JESUS THE MESSIAH. 1 Vol., 12mo. $5.35
29. THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF SATAN. By Doctor BRAUD. $3.75
30. SCOTT'S (THOMAS) THE ENGLISH LIFE OF JESUS. Second Edition, re-written. 1 Vol., 12mo. $3.00
31. BRAITHWAITE'S ESSE AND POSSE. A COMPARISON OF DIVINE, ETERNAL LAWS AND POWERS, AS SEVERALLY INDICATED IN FACT, FAITH, AND REASON. 12mo. $5.35
32. EDMUND'S TRACES OF HISTORY IN THE NAMES OF PLACES. New edition. 1 Vol., 12mo. $3.50
33. JOURNAL OF SPECULATIVE PHILOSOPHY. Published in St. Louis. 5 Vols. in 4. $14.00
34. COMTE'S POSITIVE PHILOSOPHY. Translated by HARRIS MARTINEAU. 2 Vols. $8.00
35. BRIDGES' UNITY OF COMTE'S LIFE AND DOCTRINE. 8vo, paper. $1.25
36. COMTE'S CATECHISM OF POSITIVISM. Translated by CONGREVE. 1 Vol., 12mo. $3.25
37. HARDY'S MANUAL OF BUDDHISM. 1 Vol., 8vo. $6.00
38. HARDY'S ORIGIN OF EASTERN MONACHISM. $3.75
39. NEALE'S ANALOGY OF THOUGHT AND NATURE. $3.75
40. HARRISON'S MEANING OF HISTORY. $5.00
41. ESSAY ON TREE AND SERPENT WORSHIP. $6.00
42. NEWMAN'S THE BIGOT AND THE SCEPTIC. $6.00
43. MARTINEAU'S NEW AFFINITIES OF FAITH. $6.00
44. HIND'S FREE DISCUSSION OF RELIGIOUS TOPICS. $6.00
45. JEWISH LITERATURE AND MODERN EDUCATION. $7.50
46. NEWMAN'S CAUSES OF ATHEISM. $5.00
47. CRANBROOK'S CREDIBLIA: OR DISCOURSES ON QUESTIONS OF CHRISTIAN FAITH. 1 Vol., 12mo. $1.75
48. THORNDAL'S ON THE CONFLICT OF OPINIONS. $3.00
49. CHALLIS'S CREATION IN PLAN AND IN PROGRESS. $2.00
50. COLERIDGE'S HINTS ON THE THEORY OF LIFE. $2.50
51. SCOTT'S INTELLECTUAL CHARACTER OF THE FIRST CAUSE. $1.25

FOR SALE BY

Scribner, Welford, & Armstrong,

654 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Mailed to any address on receipt of price.

CHAPTERS

FROM

THE BIBLE OF THE AGES.

FOURTEEN CHAPTERS.

SELECTED FROM

HINDU VEDAS.	SCANDINAVIAN ED.	LUIGIOTTI MOTT.
BUDDHA.	DAS.	HIGGINSON.
CONFUCIUS.	RENNAN.	T. STARR KING.
EGYPTIAN DIVINE	TALMUD.	BUCHANAN.
PIYANDER.	MILTON.	PARKER.
ZOROASTER.	PENN.	DAVIS.
TALMUD.	ADAM CLARKE.	EMMA HARDING.
BIBLE.	MARY FLETCHER.	SWERSON.
PLATO.	F. W. NEWMAN.	SWERSON.
PYTHAGORAS.	TYNDALL.	DESTON.
MARCUS AURELIUS.	MAX MUELLER.	ABROT.
EPICURUS.	ELIAS HICKS.	PROTHINGHAM.
AL KORAN.	CHANNING.	And others.
LUTHER.	GARNISON.

GOSPELS AND INSPIRATIONS FROM MANY CENTURIES AND PEOPLES.

"Slowly the Bible of the race is writ,
Each age, each kindred adds a verse to it."

EDITED AND COMPILED BY

G. B. STEBBINS, DETROIT, MICH.

Four hundred Pages; on Tinted Paper; Bound in Cloth.

PRICE $2.00.

Enclose that sum per mail, to the Editor, and it will be mailed, postage paid, to any address.

OPINIONS OF JOURNALS AND COMPETENT PERSONS

"Whether or not we accept the name chosen by the compiler, it will be found full of the highest, noblest thoughts, inspiring men to a better life, that have been uttered since literature existed."—Detroit Post.

"No one, whether conservative or liberal in religious opinion, can fail to be interested and benefited by an attentive perusal and comparison of views therein presented from so many and widely differing standpoints of observation."—AARON M. POWELL, Editor "National Standard," New York.

"It is dedicated 'to the growing multitude of thoughtful men and women who believe that "The Word of God is not bound" by any limitations of book, or race, or time, or religious systems.' Whether the reader sympathize with the idea of the compiler or not, he can hardly fail to enjoy the result of his labors."—Daily Chronicle, Washington, D. C.

"Many of these extracts are interesting from their antiquity, many from their intrinsic worth, and they are arranged in a convenient form for reference. In this mass is much noble thought, and many expressions of deep religious faith; but much of it also is worthless. But, in spite of these faults, the book will be valuable to all persons interested in the 'sympathy of religions.'"—Boston Advertiser.

"It is a book which is much needed—one that will impart solid instruction to all thoughtful and inquiring people, and therefore we hope it may receive the wide circulation that its rare merits deserve."—Boston Investigator.

"As a collection of deep religious aphorisms and ethical sayings of significance and point, the work is highly suggestive, and will reward examination in spite of the heterogeneous aspect of its contents."—New York Tribune.

"It is the delight of Mary's heart and brain, as it will be a source of Light and Life to thousands of your fellow-men."—A. J. DAVIS.

"This book, original in aim and execution, helps to meet a want long felt. Giving the best thoughts from a date far older than the Bible to our own day, it must tend to break up idolatry of a book, to banish bigotry, and give higher wisdom and truer freedom and spiritual culture. It should be in every home in the land. None should fail to obtain it."—WILLIAM DENTON.

"CHAPTERS FROM THE BIBLE OF THE AGES" is the first and impressive title of a careful compilation by Giles B. Stebbins, of Detroit, whose name is widely known among the liberal thinkers and progressive religiousists of this stirring age. He has made his selections from Hindu, Egyptian, Greek, Persian, Roman, and others; from the great illuminated souls of Europe, who have done a real service to the times in bringing together, within four hundred pages, so many noble and pure thoughts. They will refresh many a wearied spirit as with the eternal truth, and quicken to life many a man and woman who, repelled by the exclusiveness and conservatism of the churches, have been hitherto ignorant of the better fellowship that links into one great brotherhood the wise and true of all periods. All minor defects, in plan and proportions, we gladly overlook in consideration of its many and great excellences. Whoever buys it will receive many times the worth of his money."—F. E. ABROT, Editor "Index," Toledo, Ohio.

"Mr. G. B. Stebbins, a gentleman well-known in this State, is editor and compiler of a book which he entitles 'The Bible of the Ages.' We do not recognize any special propriety in the title, but the extracts and sentiments are such as most persons will be glad to have within reach. Some of the noblest conceptions which the genius of man has attained are to be found in it."—HON. GEORGE WILLARD, Editor "Battle Creek (Mich.) Journal."

"The work seems thoughtfully, honestly, reverently prepared. It will help satisfy many curious to know what word God has spoken elsewhere than in Palestine."—Carlton Register, Boston, Mass.

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, OCTOBER 12, 1872.

WHOLE No. 146.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
ARMAH WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.
COTUATIS BROOKS, PROTERIORAM, THOMAS WERTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, REV. CHARLES VOTSEY (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), REV. MORCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

The Ascent of Man:

OR THE EVOLUTION THEORY AS APPLIED TO THE HUMAN SPECIES.

A LECTURE BEFORE THE SOCIETY OF NATURAL SCIENCES, TOLEDO, DEC. 21, 1871. AND THE RADICAL CLUB, BOSTON, FEB. 12, 1872.

BY FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:—

From a scientific point of view, the most important book given to the American public within the year 1871 has been Mr. Darwin's work in two volumes on the "Descent of Man." It is the companion and completion of his "Origin of Species," which first appeared in 1859 and has been justly designated as "an epoch-making work." It not only directly applies to the human race the same general theory concerning the origin of species which was advanced in the earlier volume, but it also adds to this theory itself an elaborate exposition of the principle of Sexual Selection,—a principle which had been briefly stated in the former work, but by no means adequately developed. Taken in connection with the author's two volumes on "Animals and Plants under Domestication," in which the phenomena of inheritance are accounted for by the hypothesis of Pangenesis, the public are now in possession of five volumes by Mr. Darwin on the latest and unquestionably ablest form which the "Development Theory" has yet assumed. Although the distinguished author will undoubtedly make new additions to his theory if his life continues (and the scientific world never had greater cause to desire longevity for any of its members), it can hardly be expected that these additions will be more than simple outworks to a fortress that appears to be already impregnable. No one at all acquainted with the history of scientific discoveries can doubt, it is true, that the Development Theory will undergo future changes in some respects; but that its great leading principles have been determined and finally established by Mr. Darwin is to-day the conviction of the great majority of the ablest scientific men. The high significance, therefore, of his most recent work lies in the fact that it directly includes the human race under the operation of biological laws which are seen to be operative throughout the rest of the animated world,—thus effectually and permanently breaking down the barriers of ignorance, prejudice, and pride, by which man has hitherto ungratefully sought to keep at a distance the great Mother-Nature whose child he is. He will henceforth be ashamed to do such dishonor to her who bore him.

In entitling his book the "Descent of Man," Mr. Darwin took the word descent in its purely genealogical sense, and intended to express by it the main thesis he was to advocate; namely, that Man is the descendant of earlier and lower species of organized beings, and not, as commonly claimed, a species miraculously created without any earthly parentage. In other words, Man has descended lineally from non-human ancestors, and has acquired his present pre-eminence in the animal kingdom by a long series of slow and gradual changes, wrought in the plastic organization of earlier forms. For the expression of this fundamental idea, no more appropriate title could have been selected. But the moment I first saw the words, it occurred to me that for a book designed for popular reading the title "Ascent of Man" would have been even more appropriate. Considering that a common, though very stupid, objection to the Development Theory is that it "degrades" Man to make him the "descendant" of lower species, I thought that the title chosen might possibly suggest to some minds the idea of "degradation," of "descent" from a higher to a lower place in the scale of being, and thus arouse disagreeable associations that might perhaps tend to increase prejudice or intensify the popular repugnance to embrace a theory not in harmony with popular misconceptions. Whether this has been the case, I do not know. But since it is the very essence of the Development Theory that under changing conditions all species either gradually improve or else gradually perish, and since it teaches that Man has slowly climbed from a lower to a higher place in Nature, I have preferred for this lecture the title "Ascent of Man," as better expressing the real spirit of the Darwinian doctrine and the real influence it must exert on the future of science.

To enter into the details of the subject would not only be wearisome but profitless; there is no way to master these details but the way of hard, long-continued and patient work. Even were I competent to attempt it, I could not in an hour give even a glimpse of the vast array of observations, the intricate and perplexing reasonings, the utter labyrinth of facts, inferences, objections, answers, arguments and counter-arguments, errors and corrections, which he must wander through who really means to comprehend the subject in all its bearings. In fact, the Development Theory has created already a vast literature of its own in many languages; and all the leisure I have been able to devote to it for several years past has only shown me how much there is that I should be glad to read. To-night, therefore, I shall only undertake to give a general view of the subject in one or two of its most important aspects, trusting that some of you, at least, may be prompted to test my conclusions by your own independent investigations. I shall not scruple to express my own convictions with entire plainness, though I hope also with entire courtesy towards those who do not share them. Since you have kindly invited me to discuss this subject, I should be wanting in respect both to you and to myself, were I to discuss it otherwise than frankly.

To begin, then, with a proposition which no one will dispute: The Universe has had a History. Reaching backwards into the regions of a by-gone eternity, where even the keen eye of speculation can discern nothing save mist and darkness, stretches an interminable series of events—an endless procession of phenomena which constitute what is called the course of Nature. The word history is usually limited to the career of nations; to the rise and fall of kingdoms, empires, and republics; to the doings of men or communities of men. But the few thousand years of human history are as nothing compared with the duration of the Universe we inhabit. It too has had a history, of which the annals of mankind are but an utterly insignificant fraction. Millions and millions of years before any being trod the earth that could be dignified with the name of man,—nay, millions and millions of years before this earth was in a condition to be trod by any living foot,—events transpired, and had been transpiring for periods of limitless duration, which were fit themes for more than mortal historian. But no historian was there, unless the Universe was its own historian, and wrote the diary of an eternal career in the very facts of Nature as they now exist. No contemporaneous witnesses of these vast events survive. Seeing eye, and hearing ear, and recording hand, were absent. What has been must be learned from what is, or not at all.

Now two attempts have been made by man to recover this lost History of the Universe. Filled with awe at the magnitude and sublimity of the existing monuments of an immeasurable past, and baffled in all endeavors to decipher the hieroglyphics of their inscriptions, human IMAGINATION seized the historian's pen, and wrote down in poetic fervor the great myths of the creation which are extant in the sacred books of all religions. It essayed to see where there was no light; and, grand as were many of its guesses, they were but guesses still. To solve the enigma of Nature's creation, it created for itself the Supernatural. It pictured the inscrutable Power which had reared these majestic monuments of sun, moon, and stars,—of earth, sea, and sky, and the vast armies of organic forms that filled them with life,—as a Being in kindred form, sitting above Nature, and creating it by a word. This picture of a Being in the guise of man, but vaster, moulding alien matter as a man moulds clay, and giving it such forms as pleased him best,—this conception of a God external to Nature and superior to it, looking down upon matter as dead substance into which life could come solely by the inbreathing of his own breath,—has been in all ages the popular object of worship; and in the popular belief every event in Nature has been the fiat of his will. Such is the history of the universe, as guessed and written by human Imagination in the sacred name of Religion.

But since those early dreams of poetic fancy became crystallized into the great historical religions of the world, human REASON has seized anew the historian's pen, and essays to interpret Nature in a worthier way. It finds Nature infinite in space; its duration infinite in time; its Cause infinite, immanent, and omnipresent. "Outside of Nature," or "above Nature," or "superior to Nature,"—these are phrases which are mere empty sound, signifying nothing. Nature is the All. What room is there for more than that—for the Supernatural? All events in Nature take place by purely natural causes, in accordance with purely natural laws. What is commonly called "teleology," that is, the assumption of the direction of natural forces to accomplish the ends of a supernatural or extraneous will, is a remnant of the effete conception that a will exists "outside of" or "above" Nature. Nature is all-sufficient, all-comprehensive, all-sustaining, and self-sustaining. All events in the past and the present and the future are bound together indissolubly by the uniformity of changeless law. Throughout their entire course they have been, so far as human Reason can discover, the steps of an endless process which is an endless evolution of the universe. The unity of Nature working by natural laws and natural causes in the direction of gradual development,—that is the history of the universe as written by human Reason in the name of Science.

These two histories, one supernatural, one natural—one written by Imagination, one by Reason—cannot both be true. If it were not that there is a higher Religion than that which thus contradicts modern Science, no resource would be left for a rational mind but to abjure Religion forever. But this is not the case. Although I cannot now pause to consider this point, I must in justice to myself say at least as much as this—that the God of Science is an infinitely nobler object of worship than the Gods of the world's historical religions.

—God of the granite and the rose!
—Soul of the sparrow and the bee!
The mighty tide of being flows
Through countless channels, Lord, from thee:
It leaps to life in grass and flowers,
Through every grade of being runs,
While from creation's radiant fountains
Its glory flames in stars and suns."

There are thus two widely unlike ways of looking at the Universe and of interpreting its history—the one natural, the other supernatural. All the great battles between Science and what is called Religion have been, are, and will be fought in the interest of these two conflicting views of Nature. In every such battle Science has always won and will always win: her triumph is only a question of time. But even in science itself the influence of the supernatural view has made itself felt, and still survives in the obscurer field of investigation. In fact, the progress of science can be measured by the degree of thoroughness with which the natural has superseded the supernatural view in the opinions of scientific men. So fixed a rule has this become that even the conservatives of science more or less plainly admit it; as, for instance, the Duke of Argyll, one of the ablest opponents of the Darwinian doctrine, who says: "It is the Natural which has been casting out the Supernatural—the idea of Natural Law, the universal reign of a fixed Order of things." [Beign of Law, p. 3.]

Looked at in a large way, the whole theory of Mr. Darwin concerning the origin of species, and the still more comprehensive theory of a gradual evolution of the universe (of which Mr. Darwin's theory is only a part) are attempts to "cast out the Supernatural" from those regions of science in which it is still lingering, like a ghost surprised by the first faint rays of dawn. In the apt language of Fritz Müller: "As in Christian lands there is a catechism morality which everybody quotes, but nobody feels himself bound to follow or expects to be followed by others, so also zoology has her dogmas, which are just as universally acknowledged as they are practically denied." With quiet humor Dr. Hooker remarks somewhere that naturalists who believe new species to be miraculously created always believe this creation to take place in some region remote from human observation. All postulates of supernatural intervention in the order of Nature are an embarrassment to free investigation of natural causes, since they are a denial of natural causes; they are dead dogmas of the past, the putrescent and unburied superstitions of science, which, as a mere matter of sanitary protection of the human mind, should be interred with as much haste as is consistent with decency. Let us, then, distinctly recognize the fact that the largest and profoundest importance of Mr. Darwin's theory must be found in its substitution of natural causes for supernatural volitions, in the explanation of the origin of species. It has the dogma of the origin of species by miraculous creation in the "tomb of the Capulets" by the side of similar extinct superstitions, shuts the door, locks it, and then flings away the key. The demonstration that man, like every other species of living forms, is the descendant of still earlier species, cuts off the last refuge of the supernatural idea in the region of biology; and henceforth the universality of natural causation in the production of new species will be regarded as one of the commonest truths of science.

Let me say here that it is enough to make one somewhat impatient to observe the air of judicial doubt with which many English and American men of science affect to receive Mr. Darwin's theory "provisionally." This affectation of caution is an act of deference to popular prejudice which verges on sycophancy. No man, scientific or otherwise, who is thoroughly imbued with the idea of the universality of natural causation can hesitate for one moment to reject absolutely the theory of creation of new species by supernatural volition. No more can he hesitate to accept absolutely the main thesis of Mr. Darwin's theory, that the origin of new species must be accounted for by natural causes alone. And no more can he hesitate to accept absolutely the leading principles of this theory, as revealing at least some of these natural causes. Mr. Darwin himself does not claim to have discovered all of them. Especially he confesses his ignorance of the causes of "spontaneous variations" in organic forms; and he has only an avowedly "provisional hypothesis" to offer in explanation of the fact of transmission of these forms by inheritance. But the great features of his theory are not speculations, but facts—not hypotheses, but discoveries; and it is somewhat ludicrous to a logical mind to notice the gravity with which some modern wiseacres shake their heads and oracularly pronounce sentence: "There is much to be said on both sides of the question!" So there is, if you concede to mere imagination and superstition and ignorance the same right to speak on it that you accord to reason and scientific knowledge. Otherwise not. That the Darwinian theory is the complete explanation of the origin of species, nobody claims; nor do I believe this. But that the theory is true so far as it goes, I venture to affirm that no man of ordinary intelligence and education who fairly examines it can possibly deny. The coyness and timidity with which so many American and English savans have been wont to approach the subject does no honor to their insight or their courage, and contrasts very unfavorably with the reception given to Darwinism in Germany by such men as Prof. Haeckel of Jena, whose Natürliche Schöpfungsgeschichte is the best and most systematic work on the subject with which I am acquainted. It needs only sufficient information, strength of intellect, and moral fearlessness, to ensure acceptance of Mr. Darwin's theory in all its essential features. One might as wisely doubt the law of gravitation.

It is plain, on reflection, that the Development Theory of the origin of species, including man, is the only scientific theory on the subject really before us. It is so represented by Prof. Huxley: "There is but one hypothesis regarding the origin of species of animals in general which has any scientific existence—that propounded by Mr. Darwin." [Man's Place in Nature, p. 125.] The other quasi-scientific theory of special creation is really no theory at all, since it cuts off all inquiry into the origin of species with the bald assertion that they were independently created. How, when, or where, is a question which it does not even pretend to answer. The story of Genesis is seldom appealed to now in scientific circles; and no one who defends the notion of miraculous creation ventures to give any definite description of what he means. I propose, therefore, briefly to sketch the outlines of Mr. Darwin's theory, as the only one in the field; and to state its application to mankind.

First of all, what is a species? Animals and plants, the two great divisions of organic life, are each divided and subdivided into groups, which become smaller and smaller as the process of division goes on. A kingdom is divided into sub-kingdoms; a sub-kingdom into provinces; a province into classes; a class into orders; an order into families; a family into genera; and a genus into species. A species, then, is the smallest of these groups; and it consists of all those individual animals (I pass by the plants now) which are distinguished from all other animals by constantly recurring characteristics, however trivial, and which at the same time, when paired, will produce fertile offspring. The differences, then, between species of animals, are partly structural and partly physiological. Almost every species may be subdivided into varieties which are each distinguished from each other by constant structural peculiarities; but the male of one variety, paired with the female of another variety, will breed fertile offspring, that is, offspring which will reproduce their kind in turn. But if you pair a male of one species with a female of another species, they may have offspring called hybrids, and yet these hybrids cannot reproduce their kind. Mules, for instance, the offspring of the horse and ass, which are distinct species, are sterile; they cannot reproduce their kind. [Huxley, Origin of Species, pp. 104–106.]

Let us now take a familiar instance and see what the true question of the origin of species is. You are aware that there is a class of animals commonly called the cat tribe, or, in scientific language, the genus Felis. This genus Felis comprises several distinct species: for instance, Felis domestica, the house-cat; Felis catus, the wild-cat; Felis pardus, the panther; Felis onca, the jaguar; Felis tigris, the tiger; Felis leo, the lion, and so forth. The tiger and the lion thus belong to the same genus, but to different species; they have common characteristics which mark the genus, and peculiar characteristics which mark the species; and they cannot produce fertile offspring together. The question is, whence did these unlike species come?

The answers to this question, in the nature of things, can be only two.

The first answer is that the tiger and lion have always been just as they are, and were created just as they are by a supernatural act of power, independently of all parents or ancestors: this is the theory of special creation. It maintains the immutability of all species, and the independent origination of each by a special and miraculous exertion of divine power. The mode of this creation it does not venture to state; but it cuts off all further inquiry into the origin of species.

The second answer is that the lion and tiger have not always been what they now are, but have each acquired their specific characters in the course of time by gradual modifications of their structure. They, as well as the other members of the cat-tribe, are divergent lines of offspring from the common ancestors of the whole genus Felis. These common ancestors were exactly like neither the tiger nor the lion, but resembled both; and they were themselves the descendants of still earlier species that had gone before. This answer maintains the variability of all species, and the origination of each species by descent with modification from earlier species. If you inquire for the proofs of these assertions, I must refer you to Mr. Darwin and his coadjutors; I am only stating, not proving, the theory. But I must present briefly the leading points of the theory, which are in themselves arguments, and, when taken altogether, very weighty arguments.

All organisms tend to multiply in geometrical ratio. What this means will be made clear by an illustration I borrow from Prof. Huxley [Origin of Species, pp. 117–119]. Suppose that the whole surface of the earth (about 51,000,000 square miles) had the same climate and the same soil; that only one organic being, a plant, was in existence; that the plant produced fifty seeds a year; that each one of these seeds produced fifty more each year, and so on; and that each plant thus produced occupied one square foot of ground. In nine years every foot of ground on the earth would be occupied by a plant! That is, the single plant supposed at first would in nine years have stocked the whole available surface of the earth. This illustration shows that organisms tend to multiply with inconceivable rapidity; for what is true of this hypothetical plant is more or less true of all other organisms. It is plain, therefore, that there must be some check to this rapid increase. As a matter of fact, Mr. Darwin has shown that the number of deaths and births of any species are about equal on the average, and that the number of individuals of any species is nearly stationary.

This result is due to a Struggle for Existence, which must necessarily prevail where a vast number of organisms are every year crowded out of being. Any advantage, however slight, enjoyed by any one of these competing organisms, might turn the scale in its favor, and give it victory over its less favored competitors. Professor Wyman, for instance, noticed in Florida that all the pigs were black. On inquiry, he was informed that in the Florida woods there grew a root called the Paint Root, which, if eaten by white pigs, had the effect of making their skin crack, and they died; while, if eaten by black pigs, no such result followed. This case illustrates the famous principle of Natural Selection, by which the best chance of life is given to organisms in which any favorable variation (in this case the black color) should be developed; and while at the same time a worse chance of life is given to organisms which are thus placed at a disadvantage. It also illustrates the appearance of variations in members of the same species; and as variations tend to be transmitted like other characters to offspring, we see how inheritance, combined with variation, will tend to create a new variety of the species, if the variation is favorable to life, or to prevent its creation, if the variation is unfavorable.

Thus Inheritance, Variation, and Natural Selection are shown to be laws which, operating in a general Struggle for Existence, must necessarily tend to make those organisms survive which are best adapted to their condition. This is what is called the Survival of the Fittest—that is, the victory in the race for life which is won by those organisms which happen to be best adapted by birth or circumstance to enter the lists under favorable auspices. Those organisms which are destitute of the favorable variation will die out by degrees; and those which have it will alone survive. Thus a new variety will become established, which may, by accumulation of such variations, finally appear as a new species. For the conditions of existence (climate, soil, food, and so forth), as geology shows, change in the course of ages; and the change in the conditions of existence, being seconded by a gradual adaptation on the part of organisms, must and does tend gradually to evolve new species out of old ones, without the need of any miraculous creation.

This, in a very condensed form, is the Development Theory as advocated by Mr. Darwin. It accounts for the gradual evolution of new species out of old ones by natural causes now in existence. It thus renders unnecessary any assumption of supernatural volitions to account for it; and whatever is found to be unnecessary soon perishes from science. The question which Mr. Darwin has fairly brought before the general public by his latest work is the question whether man is an exception to the laws which have determined the appearance of all other species, and is to claim an origin which is denied to them; or whether, like all the other species, man must look for ancestors to more ancient and lower forms of being. In a word, what was the origin of man?

This question must be answered from two different points of view—the biological and the historical. His origin must be investigated as a question of biology and as a question of history. Prof. Huxley, in his Man's Place in Nature, declares that "Man is a member of the same order (for which the Linnean term Primates ought to be retained) as the Ape and Lemur. This order is now divisible into seven families, of about equal systematic value; the first, the Anthropini, contains man alone; the second, the Catarrhini, embraces the old world apes; the third, the Platyrrhini, all new world apes except the marmosets, etc., etc." [p. 124.] In another and later work he makes man constitute one of three sub-orders into which he divides the Order of Primates, namely, the Anthropidae with man alone, the Simiidae including monkeys of all kinds, and the Lemuridae with the diversified genera of lemurs. On this determination of Man's place in Nature, Mr. Darwin remarks:—"As far as differences in certain important points of structure are concerned, man may no doubt rightly claim the rank of a sub-order; and this rank is too low, if we look chiefly to his mental faculties. Nevertheless, under a genealogical point of view, it appears that this rank is too high, and that man ought to form merely a family, or possibly only a sub-family." [Descent of Man, Vol. I, p. 187.]

This, then, is the fact with regard to man's actual position in the scale of organic life. He is a member of the same order, at least, as the gorilla and the chimpanzee, the orang and the gibbon; and while there seems to be some doubt whether he should be ranked by himself as a sub-order, a family, or only a sub-family, I suppose that he will henceforth be undoubtedly classified in the same order of Primates with the apes and monkeys. Prof. Huxley states explicitly (and his rank as a comparative anatomist is among the highest): "Whatever system of organs be studied, the comparison of their modifications in the ape series leads to one and the same result—that the structural differences which separate man from the gorilla and the chimpanzee are not so great as those which separate the gorilla from the lower apes." [Man's Place in Nature, p. 123.] The fact, therefore, of man's close relationship to the animal kingdom, as shown by his existing organization, is in perfect harmony with the theory that he is the direct descendant of lower forms of animal life.

So far, indeed, have these investigations been carried, that an approximate pedigree has been made out for us, tracing back our ancestry so far that it loses itself in the mists of the remotest antiquity. Mr. Darwin himself holds that man in both hemispheres is descended from the same stock whence the present Catyrrhine or Old World monkeys have been derived,—these being one great branch of the Simiadae, which were themselves descended from the Lemuridae; and so on back to the most ancient ancestors of all the Vertebrata—"marine animals resembling the larvae of existing Ascidians." [Descent of Man, Vol. I, p. 204; Vol. II, p. 372.] Prof. Haeckel goes even into greater detail. He gives an elaborate genealogy of the human species, which consists of twenty-two steps or degrees, tracing the present race of men back to men devoid of language (sprachlose Menschen), these to men-apes, or tailless Catyrrhines, these to tailed Catyrrhines, these to half-apes (Prosimia), these to marsupials, and so on, back to the Monera or "organisms without organs," not even possessing the cell form, but identical with simple Cytods, and having their origin in spontaneous generation out of inorganic matter. [Natürliche Schöpfungsgeschichte, pp. 578-592.]

This is only carrying out with rigorous logic the principles of the Development Theory. They involve ultimately this assumption of spontaneous generation, that is, the insensible gradation between unorganized and organized matter. If Prof. Haeckel shocks anybody by thus tracing the ancestry of mankind back to the inorganic elements of the earth, I see no reason for such shock, since the Bible does the very same thing. It creates Adam out of the "dust of the ground," and Prof. Haeckel does no more.

Thus biology gives her answer in favor of the Development Theory. History, so far as it speaks at all, speaks to the same effect. Primitive man has left no written records, it is true; but flints and rude tools become volumes under the eyes of scientific genius. The famous Engis and Neanderthal skulls tell their own stories, albeit thousands of years have elapsed since living tongue moved in the now decaying jaws. By the labors of such men as Aimé Boué, Buckland, Tournal, de Christol, Schermerling, Boucher de Perthes, Lund, Lubbock, Prestwich, Falconer, Evans, Lartet, Garrigou, and hosts of others, the high antiquity of man, extending far beyond the little limits of Biblical chronology, has been established beyond all reasonable doubt. So much has been done in the way of investigation, that myriads of precious relics have been accumulated in museums, public and private, proving by ocular demonstration the fact of man's existence in a low and degraded condition, scarcely above that of the brutes, long ages before he was formerly known to have existed. The Epoch of the Great Bear and Mammoth, and the Epoch of the Reindeer, animals long since extinct in Southern Europe, beheld savage man living on fruits and roots or raw flesh, clad in skins, sleeping under trees or in caves, and destitute of everything that now makes human life beautiful or even endurable.

Louis Figuier, however, whose work on "Primitive Man" is full of valuable information on the subject, makes his illustrations in singular contrast with his text. He describes man at this early period as I have stated; yet he depicts him in his illustrations as an Apollo, noble, intellectual in face, refined and even poetic in air and attitude. The incongruity is ludicrous. The man of the illustrations ought to live in Paris, go to the opera, libraries, and art museums, and live in the world of fashion or of letters; while the man of the text ought to be an ugly and brutal fellow, rough, fierce, and unkempt. Figuier has transported Fenimore Cooper's idealized Indian to the Stone Age, and with his pencil, at least, made him out to be the "noble savage" that excites the pity or animosity of all who profess to know the savage as he is. The reason of this laughable incongruity is plain. Figuier denies and despises the Development Theory as "degrading," so he is determined that the confessed savage of the Stone Age shall have the intellectual head and fine physique of the civilized man. Into a similar absurdity is every theorist plunged who maintains that man always was what he is now. If he had been, his condition would always have been what it is now. The very fact of a progress from barbarism to civilization is itself a proof to some extent of the Development Theory of the human species, for it proves a gradual improvement of the human organization, without which man would have been barbarous still.

Thus biology and history concur in affirming the essential truth of the Development Theory. No also does the spirit of the age. Man is today conscious as never before of his splendid future, and he rejoices in the slow but sure demonstration by science of a theory which is strong confirmation of his hopes. For this theory means the continued "Ascent of Man" in the future, as in the past. And when I hear croakers dismally bewailing its evil influences on society or morals or religion, I would fain ask what influence but evil, "and that continually," can proceed from the other theory that we have fallen from a high estate, and now lie grovelling helpless in the mire till some one shall come and pull us out? If anything could quench hope and freeze purpose, will not that do it? No, the Development Theory is the most cheerful and hopeful that could be devised; and, for one, I rejoice on moral, poetical, social, and religious grounds, that Science is to-day making its truth so plain, that none but the prejudiced and ignorant can long withhold assent.

FREE RELIGION AND SCIENCE.

[From the New York Union Advocate, Sept. 26, 1872.]

The advocates of free religion, as it is called, have a great deal to say about science as the main ground of their hope of success. In this they show their folly. The great pioneers of science, including Bacon and Newton, have as a whole been anything but free religionists in their sense. They were firm believers in the religion of the Bible, to which they bowed in reverence, and recognized as the great stimulator of their minds the study of the Word of God. They found the great facts of science to be so many manifestations of the nature and attributes of the Jehovah of prophets and apostles. But the opposite should have been the case, if the position of modern free thinkers be correct. The majority of the leading scientists of the present age are believers in the Bible. The institutions where science is most successfully cultivated owe their origin and fostering support mainly or entirely to Christianity.

It is noticeable how ready free religionists are to seize for their comfort and support any baseless theory or seeming scientific truth that may be broached. Some years ago, when certain scientists advanced the theory of a plurality of origins of the human race, they swallowed that as a sweet morsel; they set it down as solid truth, and therefore the Bible could not be true. When Darwin advances the theory that man had one origin from an extinct species of monkeys in South Africa, they seize that voraciously as the only true theory; and, therefore, the Bible cannot be true. They seem to think and act on the principle—anything to overthrow the Christian religion. Consistency and logical reasoning they seem to have not the slightest regard for. Mr. Abbot of the Index writes to Mr. Darwin, and expresses great pleasure and hope in his monkey theory, as sustaining him in his crusade against the Christian religion in America. Darwin replies to him, and says in regard to his atheistic creed: "I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost soul; and I agree to almost every word."

Free religionists accept as established truth Darwinism, while the majority of leading scientists reject it as contrary to science. The leading scientific society in France a short time since rejected the name of Darwin for membership, when proposed, because his theory was so contrary to the facts of science. Truly, Mr. Abbot and his associates must be in a sad predicament, and exceedingly short of timber to build up their system. True science is against them.

[Passing by the Union Advocate's account of our private correspondence, which, as we have never informed the public what we wrote to Mr. Darwin, the writer of the above is obliged to invent freely in order to suit his own purposes, we desire to call especial attention to two of his statements which manifest an even greater tenderness of conscience with regard to the moral obligation of accuracy. "The majority of the leading scientists of the present age are believers in the Bible." "The majority of leading scientists reject it [Darwinism] as contrary to science." Probably some question may arise as to who are the "leading scientists of the present day." We see no way to save the reputation of the Union Advocate except by attributing that high honor to Father Hecker, Rev. J. D. Fulton, Elder Miles Grant, Dr. McCosh, the Pope of Rome, and the writer of the article above quoted, who will doubtless endorse the whole list in consideration of the closing name.—Ed.]

OF NO PERMANENT BENEFIT.—Dr. Döllinger says that of all the Jesuit missions to Japan, Paragana, the North American Indians, Greece, Persia, China, and Egypt, scarcely the recollection survives, while Spain, upon which they impressed their spirit so completely that they made it one grand monastery, produces nothing in literature, and, excepting Turkey, is the most retrograde country in Europe.—Union Advocate.

A minister not long ago preached from the text—"Be ye, therefore, steadfast!" but the printer made him expound from "Be ye there to breakfast."

Voices from the People.

"Your INDEX came to me through the P. O. some three months since. I have from that time obtained it through my agent, and I read the same with increased interest. I have long entertained the same sentiments. I think they accord with many of our celebrated English authors—namely, Butler, Pope, and many others; but you have made the subject more plain to ordinary minds. I have lent out all my numbers of THE INDEX to my friends, and am now at a loss for a reperusal of the same. I see you advertise a bound volume; please send the same to me and any other numbers for distribution, especially Rev. C. Voysey's Lectures, if you have them separate."

"For more than fifty years I have been seeking for truth, and have long since ceased to expect to find it within the bounds of sectarianism. Your publication appears to come nearer it than any other I have met with. I would gladly do more for you than I have been able to do, but I live in a Presbyterian community and am comparatively poor. I hope yet to be able to take a share in your enterprise, but cannot until some debts are paid. In the meantime I wish all success to the enterprise."

"We all wish you success, and hope soon to send something more substantial than wishes, as we could not well do without it now, and hope that whatever improvements are made, the size of the paper may remain, as it is the most convenient size for reading."

"Please accept my subscription for one share of THE INDEX fund, $100. When rationalists from a nobler motive do for humanity what religionists do as a duty to God, there will be no scarcity of funds to advance such enterprises as the one which is so worthily engaging your attention."

"I am much delighted with your paper, and hope it will continue to flourish and prosper. I hate priestcraft, and would like to see all exercise freedom of thought. A religion which will not bear the strictest investigation is but a rotten prop to trust in; far less can it be called the revealed religion of God."

"I congratulate you on the success of the Index Association. Some of us Radicals here feel the deepest interest in the continuance of the paper."

"Though not agreeing with all of your statements I certainly appreciate the glorious little INDEX. It is the enlightener of this superstitious world."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at ODEON HALL, St. Clair Street, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Cash Receipts for the week ending October 5.—John S. Baldwin, $3.50; N. S. Townsend, 50 cts.; T. A. Heywood, 85 cts.; Jonathan Watson, $10; Morris Einstein, $10; Jno. Mc Lanchlin, 10 cts.; George H. Holliman, $2.50; A. Fullerton, 50 cts.; H. L. Hall, $10; C. Robinson, $12; Mrs. H. B. Bostwick, $10; P. Rousevelt Johnson, 25 cts.; Rev. Arthur M. Knapp, 10 cts.; American Unitarian Ass'n, 10 cts.; Cecile Skean, 25 cts.; Charles Collins, 40 cts.; Jno. C. Rooney, $20; Joe. H. Wilbur, 25 cts.; Mary Shannon, $5; Mary C. Shannon, $10; J. C. March, 10 cts.; Jno. Shackleton, $2; Albert B. Brown, $4; Mrs. A. G. Cook, $2; Alfred J. Wolf, $3; A. High, $3; Rev. J. C. Levrard, $5; George Lewis, $1; Mrs. H. L. B. Bostwick, $1.50; William Underwood, $10; LaRoy Sunderland, $3; William Chase, $5; William Tucker, $3; Dr. J. B. Stevens, 50 cts.; Jno. H. Johnson, $3; Cecile Skean, 75 cts.; Marion Martin, 50 cts.; T. L. Harris, $3; Geo. T. Moffatt, $3; Nathan Tabor, $1; A. W. Hodskins, $2; E. G. Burnett, $3; Walter F. Austin, $2.50; Asner Tyler, $3.50; F. W. Cook, $30.00; Mrs. J. J. Pillsbury, $10.00; James P. Veatch, $1; Dr. H. W. Cloud, $2; Rev. T. B. Forbush, $2; Lyman Little, $2; George Rose, $1; Stephen Baber, $3; Geo. B. Hicks, $2; William A. Butler, $3; N. H. Webster, $2; Joseph Berlin, 50 cts.; Mrs. C. B. Groot, $3; B. G. Sweet, $3.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be purchased at the same amount without further notice.

N. B.—THE INDEX is payable in advance. Its friends should not be offended if the paper is stopped at the expiration of their terms as indicated by the mail-tag. We have no means of knowing whether they wish it continued or not except by the receipt or non-receipt of the subscription price.

N. B.—Please examine the ADDRESS and DATE on your INDEX mail-tag, and report at once any error in either.

N. B.—If your INDEX mail-tag is not changed within three weeks after renewing your subscription, please notify us immediately. But do not write before the expiration of that time.

N. B.—Postage on THE INDEX is five cents per quarter, dating from receipt of the first number, payable in advance at the place of delivery.

N. B.—In case of any error in your mail tag, always state the post-office at which the paper is received, and also the name just as it is now printed. Then state any desired correction.

N. B.—Please remit by post-office money-order, by registered letter, or by draft on New York. Cheques on interior banks are liable to discount, and the term of subscription will be proportionally shortened in the credit.

N. B.—When writing about a former remittance, always give the date of such remittance as exactly as possible.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000.

SHARES EACH $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 30, 1873. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED elsewhere. Seven Hundred and Fifty Shares.				$75,000
JOHN J. STEVENS, Oswego, N. Y.,	One	Share	100
C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, "	"	"	100
J. HENRY CLARKE, "	"	"	100
E. B. WALDO, "	"	"	100
G. N. STEARNS, "	"	"	100
JOHN M. RICE, "	"	"	100
MARSHALL BROS., Minneapolis, Minn.,	"	"	100
S. LYDIARD, Long Lake, "	"	"	100
J. G. RICHARDSON, Lake City, "	Two	"	200
DR. D. K. BOUTWELL, "	One	"	100
R. E. GRIMSHAW, Minneapolis, Minn.,	"	"	100
WM. E. CROSBY, Portage City, Wis.,	"	"	100
WM. B. ELLERY, Burlington, Iowa,	"	"	100
LYMAN T. OSBORN, Auburn, N. Y.,	"	"	100
P. C. TURNER, Albany, "	"	"	100
M. SCHLESINGER, "	"	"	100
JOSEPH KNIGHT, Troy, Ohio,	"	"	180
L. S. BRYANT, Dayton, Ohio,	"	"	100
L. F. GARDNER, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.,	"	"	100
J. C. CHATTEKTON, Knickerbocker Park, N. Y.,	"	"	100
W. J. LEWIS, Ill.,	"	"	100
HARVEY HAKER, Worcester, Mass.,	"	"	100
THOS. BROWN, "	"	"	100
C. W. ENTERBROOK, "	"	"	100
E. B. LORING, Boston, "	"	"	100
JURIN EDECOCK, "	Five	"	500
A. FOLGOM, (in trust), "	Three	"	300
JOHN WETTERBERG, "	One	"	100
E. A. GREENE, "	"	"	100
F. S. DUNHAM, "	Two	"	200
N. CUMMINGS, "	One	"	100
CHAS. T. HOW, "	Three	"	300
GEOR. H. FOSTER, "	One	"	100
A. A. KNIGHT, "	"	"	100
GARDNER MURPHY, "	"	"	100
GEORGE HENSHAW, "	"	"	100
HENRY N. STONE, "	"	"	100
H. E. MANN, Fond du Lac, Wis.,	"	"	100
GODFREY GUNDERM, Iowa, "	"	"	100
F. E. HENDERSON, Boston, Mass.,	One	"	100
W. C. GANNETT, "	Two	"	200
MRS. K. G. WELLS, "	One	"	100
OSCAR ROOS, Taylor's Falls, Minn.,	"	"	100
J. D. ZIMMERMAN, Union City, Mich.,	"	"	100
PURSE A. ZIMMERMAN, "	"	"	100
S. BORGE HUBBARD, "	"	"	100
S. H. NYE, "	"	"	100
CHAS. H. SPRING, "	"	"	100
D. D. W. ROGERS, "	"	"	100
G. K. WITTINGTON, Cincinnati, O.,	"	"	100
JONATHAN WATSON, Titusville, Pa.,	"	"	100
MORRIS EINHORN, "	"	"	100
MRS. W. COOK, Ravenna, Ind.,	Two	"	200
MRS. J. J. PILLBURN, Evansville, Ind.,	One	"	100
MARY SHANNON, Newton, Mass.,	Four	"	400
MARY C. SHANNON, "	One	"	100
R. L. BAKER, Ft. Fairfield, Me.,	"	"	100
				$32,600

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION:

CONDITIONAL STOCK LIST.

We, the undersigned, subscribers to the capital stock of the Index Association, agree to double our previous subscriptions to said stock on the same terms as before, taking respectively the additional number of shares set opposite to our names in the list below:

PROVIDED, That the full sum of One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000) shall have been subscribed in good faith by the twenty-sixth day of October, 1873—that is, within one year from the date when this Index passed into the hands of the Index Association.

By the Index Association.
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin, Pa.	Five	Shares. $500
CHAS. A. GURLEY,	Pulaski, N. Y.	Two	" 200
MAX PRAGHT,	Cincinnati, Ohio,	"	" 200
J. N. LYMAN,	Columbus, "	One	" 100
WALTER F. AUSTIN,	Pittsburgh, Pa.,	Two	" 200
JAS. R. STONE,	Cincinnati, Ohio,	One	" 100
A. M. HOWLAND,	Boston, Mass.,	Five	" 500
$1,800

SPECIAL NOTICE.—THE INDEX will be enlarged to sixteen pages at the commencement of its fourth volume, Jan. 1, 1873. After Sept. 30, 1873, the price of subscription will be $3.00 a year, in advance. But every subscriber, new or old, who remits $3.00 at once will be credited with a year's subscription from Jan. 1, and will meantime receive the paper free, if not already paid for.

The lecture published in our issue of this week was written and delivered nearly a year ago. We have withheld it from publication in the hope that we could find time to expand it into a series of six lectures, for which abundant material had been collected. The pressure of other work has rendered this impossible hitherto; and, seeing no immediate prospect of being able to carry out our plan, we print the paper now, regretting that it is so fragmentary a treatment of a subject of such vast proportions, and hoping even yet to execute our original purpose at some future time.

We are glad that Mr. Potter adds in another column a needed word to our recent article on "The Cost of an Idea." He guards against some misconceptions which, as we now see, might easily have sprung from what we said; and we unreservedly agree to this complementary statement.

The Index.

OCTOBER 12, 1873.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

N. B.—All letters, business or otherwise, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, Drawer 32, Toledo, Ohio."

WANTED—A NATIONAL TEMPLE TO GOD AND CHRIST.

The Republic and Courier, published in New Berne, North Carolina, and advertising itself as the "official paper of the city and county," calls special attention to the following article which was originally printed in the Friend of Temperance. Although the Republic and Courier makes no comment itself, yet we think the proposal to build a national temple to God and Christ, to be sustained by a tax upon the people, deserves particular notice as one more indication of that deep counter-current of fanaticism now developing simultaneously with the onward movement of free thought. A more outrageous proposition could not be made than to compel the whole American people to pay a poll-tax for such a purpose. It would be met as sternly as the ancient tax on tea which precipitated the Revolution. Of course the proposition is as preposterous as it is outrageous; the temple is little likely to be built. But the spirit out of which the proposal grows is as surely on the increase in a large part of our population as is the spirit of liberalism in another part of it. Again we warn the liberals of the land not to despise such signs of the times as this. There is the greatest need to-day of the multiplication of liberalizing influences, that the people may be fortified beforehand against the perils of reviving bigotry.

"THE TEMPLE OF THE LORD"

"I will not give sleep to mine eyes, or slumber to mine eyelids, until I find out a place for the Lord, an habitation for the mighty God of Jacob."—Psalm cxxvii.

To all the People of these United States, Greeting:

We have no National Temple dedicated to the worship of Almighty God.

Foreigners landing upon our shores see no indication that we as a nation acknowledge the supremacy of God, and our entire dependence upon the Lord of all the universe.

Many heathen and unbelievers are pouring into our midst, and they behold no grand object that tells of the honor in which we hold our God.

Therefore, I propose to all the people of the United States of America, that they do earnestly and seriously consider the matter, and decide within themselves whether it is not meet and proper for the Nation to erect a Temple to the worship and honor of Almighty God, and of His Son JESUS CHRIST, who has so greatly blessed us and preserved us in times of great national peril.

Be it remembered that America was the haven of safety to our forefathers in the days of religious persecution, and it is peculiarly fitting that we should in this manner perpetuate the memory of the early martyrs, and evince our gratitude to God for the cause in which they suffered, that of Religious Liberty.

I propose that this temple be built by the free will offerings of the people of all classes, colors, sects, ages, and conditions.

That it be perpetually sustained by a poll-tax of one cent (1 cent) annually, and by donations and free will offerings.

That it be situated in the most accessible part of the country attainable.

That its doors stand open by day and by night, with priests officiating.

That it contain within its walls sufficient to accommodate a priest and congregation of all the known and recognized sects who acknowledge the Lord Jesus at one and the same time.

That the gospel be preached from its pulpits in every known tongue, so that strangers, foreigners, and heathen may hear the gospel truths spoken to them in their own language.

That it be built in the form of a cross, extending wings to the four points of the compass, with portals facing thereto.

That its appearance be massive, majestic, and beautiful, and its dimensions in accord with the extent of territory and number of population with which God has blessed us.

The Chief Magistrate of the United States, Members of Congress, Governors of States, and Ministers of the Gospel are desired to take an especial interest in the matter above mentioned.

Very truly yours in Christ Jesus,
REBECCA BLEDSOE BUXTON.
FAYETTEVILLE, N. C., Aug. 24, 1872.

We have received some very curious communications since THE INDEX was first started, but the following carries off the palm. Although anonymous, and therefore not entitled to consideration, the gravity of its contents demands a suspension of all ordinary rules. Here it is:—

"GENTS:—I have seen several numbers of your INDEX, and have read them with pleasure. They exhibit decided ability and learning. The only fault I have to find is this. I am unable to see in what material respect you differ from Hume, Gibbon, Voltaire, Thomas Paine, Abner Kneeland, and other 'Infidels' or 'free thinkers,' so-called. Now is it not hypocrisy on your part to call yourselves Christians? Or is it fear—fear that you will lose caste in respectable society?"

Our readers must have noticed our extreme anxiety to prove that we are the only true Christians in this universe, and that everybody else is an "infidel." It is distressing to have this comfortable assurance so rudely disturbed; but we will meet the emergency with philosophic calmness. Our friend who is ashamed of his own name desires, like the tailless fox in the fable, to make us ashamed of ours. Well, he may have it. He needs it more than we, as he has no name at all, while we are blessed with more than we know what to do with. For instance, here is the Rev. Prof. J. R. W. Sloane, D.D., one of the chief champions of the Christian Amendment, who, in the Christian Statesman of July 15, offers a captivating substitute for the name so ruthlessly torn from us by our anonymous correspondent:—

"This is the season of College Commencements, and a fitting time to talk a little about them in connection with the 'National Reform.' The hold which it has taken upon these institutions is one of the most gratifying features of our work. The ablest writers and speakers enlisted have been College Presidents and Professors: Lewis, McIlvaine, Edwards, Stoddard, Seelye, Hays, Blanchard, etc. There is a natural and sufficient reason for this: the movement rests on a thoroughly scientific basis; it therefore commends itself to thoroughly educated minds. No one can fail to have observed that the opposition has come from such empirics in political philosophy as Spear, Beecher, and Greeley; athletes like Abbot, who, in denying a personal God, deny the possibility of science; charlatans like those who swear by the 'sorceress' Woodhull, and men who do not know what they believe on this or any other question."

There is no danger that we shall be sent to the Dead-Letter Office for lack of a "handle" to our name by which to be identified. The high official in the nether regions to whose care we are consigned will doubtless receive the package in due season, if there is any virtue in a full direction.

Much as we regret the failure of our Machiavellian policy in palming ourself off upon the public as a "Christian," we shall put the best face possible on the affair; and, seeing the fullness of our little game, we hereby heroically resolve to yield no longer to the "hypocrisy" and "fear" which have hitherto governed our course.

In his opening sermon before the Presbyterian General Assembly, at Detroit, the Rev. Dr. Humphrey said: "We live in an age when mechanics and trade threaten to eclipse the Cross." Not only mechanics and trade, but the spread of knowledge, the increase of intelligence, and the general tendencies of civilization, are contributing to that "eclipse." The Cross and the Crescent are no longer banners under which humanity can march. Not "faith in Christ," but "faith in Man," is the watchword of the future.

Mrs. Lois Waisbrooker, of Battle Creek, Michigan, sends us a circular addressed to "The Spiritualists of Michigan and elsewhere," announcing that she intends soon to issue a weekly paper to supply the place of the Present Age, deceased. As we cannot make room for such matter in these columns, we advise all persons interested to send to Mrs. Waisbrooker for the circular.

"The religious idea," said Mazzini, "is the very breath of Humanity; its life, soul, conscience, and manifestation. Humanity only exists in the consciousness of its origin and the presentiment of its destiny."

"SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS."

Mr. Frothingham, in his opening address as President at the last annual meeting of the Free Religious Association, spoke of the rapidity with which the idea contained in this phrase, "the Sympathy of Religions," had been made familiar to the public mind, and of the agency of the Free Religious Association in domesticating the idea in religious thought. The idea, he said, is now taken up by scholarly theologians generally, and the Association hardly needed to undertake the special advocacy of it any longer. There has certainly been great advance in this direction within the last few years, and a most encouraging advance it is. But though the idea may have become familiarized among scholarly theologians, especially of the more liberal grades, we suspect it has as yet got little foothold in the popular ranks of the sects: much less the spirit of the idea.

Not a few persons seem, indeed, to be in doubt what the phrase means. Some have imagined that those who used it were intending to take the common elements of all the specific religions and mix them mechanically together into a new compound which would be the universal religion; or that they were anticipating and trying to hasten the time when all the specific religions, though still keeping their special boundaries and claims, would yet "shake hands across the bloody chasms" that had separated them and agree to live together in fraternal unity. But every such interpretation is an evident misconception of the idea. The editor of THE INDEX has recently pointed out in one of his vigorous and clarion-toned articles, entitled "The Cost of an Idea," how impossible it is, so long as the religions keep up their boundary walls and maintain their exclusive claims, that they should come into any real fellowship; how impossible that there should be any true religious sympathy until there be "sympathy of souls." It is apparent that, to this idea of the "Sympathy of Religions," there is need, in order to set forth the full truth, of a companion-picture, which might be called the "Antagonisms of Religions." It may be said, moreover, that what makes the special religions is not so much the things in which they agree as the things in which they differ,—that is, the claims which are peculiar to each religion and which are necessarily antagonistic to the peculiar claims of all other religions. In reality, when these claims should no longer be made, the specific religions would cease to be. There would then be no religions to clasp hands, but only souls.

But it is as an argument against these special and mutually excluding claims of the religions, and towards this sympathy of souls, that the phrase "Sympathy of Religions" has its real significance and value. And it is to this end, evidently, that it has been used by those who have thought it an expressive phrase for one important feature of the free religious movement. The phrase, so far as I am aware, was first used by Mr. Higginson as the title of his lecture in the Horticultural-Hall course in Boston in 1870 (which lecture was printed in the Radical and reprinted in pamphlet by the Free Religious Association). It was afterwards made the subject of discussion at the annual meeting of the Association, an essay being presented upon it at the request of the committee by Mr. Samuel Johnson. Mr. S. Longfellow and others had before treated the same theme under the title of Unity or Universality of Religious Ideas. All these writers simply meant by the phrase and kindred phrases that underneath all the specific religions was a common ground-work of ethical and spiritual intelligence,—that in all the great historical religions were to be found essentially the same moral precepts, the same fundamental religious ideas, and a striking resemblance and kinship even in respect to details of doctrine and ceremony. This natural resemblance and relationship, indicating a common origin, was what they meant by the "Sympathy of Religions." And the concluding question was, always easily inferred, if not stated, "What need to suppose a special and miraculous revelation in Judea for disclosing truths which appear to be the common property of all intelligent races?" Or, if the audience were imagined to be Christian, "Why assume that the Almighty has specially visited your nation to put truths into your exclusive possession, when we find these truths quite as much at home in Europe and America?"

And in this sense the idea contained in the phrase "Sympathy of Religions" has done and is doing great service. It is introducing the religions to each other. It is proving them to be of the same parentage, of the same family. It is a great thing for liberal scholarship to have shown and published the fact that the Golden Rule has been taught in almost the same words in three distinct religions. It goes to prove that the elements of the Golden Rule are in human nature. And when people generally shall come to see that the spiritual and moral truth which they have been accustomed to regard as the exclusive possession of their own religion is to be found in other religions also, and that every great religion has taught some phase of truth, it will be very difficult for them to persist in the claim, from which all other exclusive, narrow, and antagonistic claims arise, that the Almighty is peculiarly their God and has made an exceptional revelation in their religion. Seeing that they believe, think, feel essentially alike, why, they must inevitably ask, keep up the walls of separation? The walls, in fact, must crumble away; the arrogant claims that have built and sustained them must vanish. The separate organizations and institutions, rooted as they are into many centuries, will not, indeed, disappear in a day nor in many days; but they must in some way coalesce into new shape to express the new and larger and freer faith. Then will there be not only a clasping of hands, but an embrace of souls.

W. J. P.

PRAYER AND SCIENCE.

A great deal has been written and said in regard to the proposition connected with Mr. Tyndall's name, to test the efficacy of prayer for the sick by scientific means. Yet it does not seem to me the matter has been fully cleared up, for two or three quite distinct things are mixed up by the writers. The proposition, as I understand it, has regard to the belief of those persons who profess to organize prayer into a means for the support of asylums, hospitals, or other institutions, or for the cure of patients suffering from bodily illness.

Such institutions exist even in Boston, and are often very much lauded even by people who do not profess to believe in or to act themselves on the theory on which they are founded.

Such institutions profess to gain everything by prayer; yet they make known their wants through the newspapers and other channels, and ascribe as an answer to prayer the gifts which come in to them from all sources. So dearly does human nature love the spiritual and the marvellous, that it is the surest means to touch the heart and the pocket to appeal to these feelings. But the response is from human nature.

Some years ago in a hospital a poor woman gave birth to triplets. She was of course appalled at the idea of having three children to provide for at once. The case was simply stated in the Boston Transcript, and help asked for her. It flowed in freely, though she was an ignorant, and, as afterwards appeared, vicious Catholic; and her friends at the hospital only asked for help in the name of common humanity.

One of the most curious instances of alleged special answer to prayer is in the autobiography of Stilling, a German physician. It is a book worth reading as a psychological study. He maintains that his whole life was a series of special providences in answer to prayer, and that his three wives lived and died at the will of the Sovereign Ruler of the Universe to facilitate his worldly prosperity. He seems simple and sincere, but it may be observed that, when he went into his closet to pray for money, he also wrote a note to Goethe or some other good worldly friend telling of his need.

Now this kind of organized prayer opens such an admirable door for humbug, hypocrisy, and imposture that I think we ought to feel grateful to the English friend who proposes to let scientific daylight in upon it. It is not at all the same thing with the pure, spontaneous aspiration of the human heart towards the Divine Spirit.

That one human being can powerfully stimulate another by mental influence, so as to call upon the reserved vital forces and restore health, seems to me a very reasonable and a very well authenticated fact. That the form of this action should be an intense petition to the Almighty to give the blessing so ardently desired, is perfectly natural, and that the desired effect often follows I fully believe.

But the same effect is also sometimes wrought by intense mental action which does not seem at all devout. When Benvenuto Cellini was casting one of his great statues, he was himself very ill of a fever. The careless workmen had let the casting go wrong, and he perceived it from his bed in the next room. With oaths and imprecations on them he sprang into the casting room, and, ordering them right and left, he saved the statue. His fever was gone, and he had no return of it.

Dr. James Jackson, the wise old man, in his Letters to a Young Physician, describing one of the worst infant maladies and detailing all the dangerous symptoms, adds: "But even then, with a mother who will not give up her child, you need not despair." This is Science recognizing the power of love and an earnest spirit as one of the means by which human life is saved. And we who believe that the Divine Spirit is immanent in every human being, and that the higher the power and the more open to it is the human channel, the more freely it flows, can have no hesitation in accepting the efficacy of prayer as inspiration and help to work and life, though we may not think we have control of a stop-cock and can turn the Divine Stream off and on at will.

There is a passage in the New Testament which seems to indicate that the fine intelligence of Jesus penetrated the fallacy of the argument drawn from experience of special providences. Is it not quite in the spirit of modern science that he asks: "Those eighteen upon whom the tower of Siloam fell and slew them, think ye that they were sinners above all men that dwell in Jerusalem?"

It is not the pure, spontaneous faith in prayer which is liable to mislead; it is the use which is made of it by those who make religion a means to further their own ends. And so thoroughly has the idea of reverence for the outward forms of religion been taught that, as Mr. Higginson says of the English, many believe that what they have cast off as useless or pernicious for themselves is yet good for others. The great need of our day is intellectual courage and veracity, which will cause us to stand by our convictions as confessors and martyrs of old did by theirs.

E. D. C.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

My last from Northern Ohio was rather an appeal for more labor and laborers than any report of my own doings. This year, as last, I shall only give the winter to Salem instead of autumn and winter both, as two years ago. I like to call it all work in or for Salem,—making the Society there my "Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions."

In some places where I go, the lectures do not even pay expenses; so there are good reasons for calling my friends in Salem a Missionary Board. Probably they have no idea how much I make them such. I hope they will forgive me for telling it to THE INDEX.

I find persons in some places to help in every way. I am now in Illinois; and Peoria and Fairburg, Princeton, Earlville, Elmwood, and La Moille, have such. And I think could the right men (or women) be found, these towns, and the district or counties comprising them, would give, at least to two, a generous support.

Your occasional correspondent, A. J. Grover, of Earlville, is already devoting much time to the work himself. And I see excellent notices of his lectures in the local newspapers. The cause of free religious thought has few more able, no more devoted friends, than he. He answers all calls to lecture within any reasonable distance, declining any compensation whatever—only accepting his travelling expenses if tendered, and cheerfully meeting them himself if they are not. He has also organized a Free Society Lyceum, or debating club, at home, which meets on every other Sunday afternoon or evening, and already numbers more members than do some of the churches; and to the mental and moral development of the town is worth more than the whole of them. At the meetings, essays are read and questions discussed; and all present, friendly or otherwise to the organization, are invited to participate.

I could give you like good account of the labors of another of your correspondents in this State, Mr. E. R. Brown of Elmwood, but my "Notes" might be extended too far. Everywhere hereabouts you have most invaluable auxiliaries, who, did they but know each other so as to co-operate more immediately with you and with one another, could and would soon raise your enterprise into such a force as was Anti-Slavery when its march seemed to shake the ground; when its devotion and persistence converted the national Congress into a national debating-club and committee of ways and means in the interest of slavery, and the whole sectarian church and pulpit into a Spanish Inquisition, so far as it had power and influence, to anathematize, persecute, and punish the Abolitionists as infidels and blasphemers against the great Juggernaut of the general idolatry.

P. P.

EDITORIAL BOOK NOTICES.

THE PIONEERS: OR, THE SOURCES OF THE BUCKEYANA, by J. Fenimore Cooper, with illustrations by F. O. C. Darley; EARLY DAYS, by Christian Reid, with illustrations by Alfred Fredericks; and A WARRIOR RACE, by Edmund Yates, are new issues in the cheap novel libraries of D. Appleton & Co., all well printed, with paper covers. Price $0.75 each. THE BROOKS OF BRIDLEMAN, by J. G. Whyte Melville, is another novel published by the same firm, handsomely bound in cloth, though the paper is not quite so good as the preceding. Our criticisms, it will be noticed, are very profound; but the superficial matters of plot, style, development of character, and so forth, must be referred to those who have leisure to attend to such trivial items. The above are for sale by T. J. Brown, Toledo.

SAILING ON THE NILE, translated by Virginia Vaughan from the French of Laurent Leprieux, and published by Roberts Brothers, Boston, is a chatty record of travels, full of gay pictures, with a faint suspicion of being touched up a little more vividly than the reality. In fact, there is a flavor of Parisian cuisine about the book which is quite intuitable in Yankee literary kitchens. The dish is at any rate palatable. M. Leprieux beholds and narrates, satirizes and poetizes, and mixes up geography, history, incident, sentiment, and moralizing, with no little skill. Life on board the dahabieh, or Nile-boat, is full of interest, bringing the voyager into contact with all that is famous and fascinating in the birthplace of civilization. He who wants to comprehend the antiquities of this wonderful land must go to Champollion, Ampère, Lenormant, Mariette, and the other great scholars, who have elevated the knowledge of Egypt into a special science, Egyptology; but he who does not aspire to get more than a peep at the Pyramids and the Sphinx, at Denderah, at Thebes, at Karnak, at Luxor,—just enough to get an appetite for more,—will hardly lay this book down before he finishes it. The translation is well done in the main, though all the "Frenchness" of the style could not be washed out. Sold by T. J. Brown, Toledo.

PAUL OF TARSUS: AN INQUIRY INTO THE TIMES AND THE GOSPEL OF THE APOSTLE OF THE GENTILES, published by Roberts Brothers, Boston, is a product and representative of the same kind of thought as that which found expression a few years ago in Ecce Homo,—independent, liberal, rationalistic, yet not sufficiently so to satisfy a thoroughly free thinker. There is neither index nor table of contents to the volume; and there is nothing to indicate the special topics treated but the running titles at top of the pages. It is singular that authors do not know the value of a good synopsis of their subjects. The anonymous author incorporates no little positive information about the times of Paul in his somewhat vague and decidedly unmethodical reflections. He considers Paul's "thorn in the flesh," about which so much has been conjectured, to have been neuralgia,—regards him as probably having been married,—and represents him as having had a "singularly graceful and winning manner." The personality of the apostle to the Gentiles is rated high, and deservedly; for there can be little doubt that, but for Paul, Christianity would never have been adapted to the part it was subsequently called to play in the world's history. But it is far too extravagant a claim to say that "the Pharisee of Tarsus has given method to modern civilization." This is part and parcel of that wild estimate of historic causes which attributes all civilization to this or that form of religion, to the total neglect of social, industrial, political, economical, scientific, and other general influences. Paul was a hero of large mould; and the great Church of Christ is in one sense his "shadow." But the world rests on the shoulders of no Atlas; and civilization owes its "method," so far as it has one, to the dawning scientific comprehension of Nature, Man, and their mutual relation. Sold by Brown & Fausco, Toledo: price $1.50.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.
N. B.—Highly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

SWINBURNE—ANOTHER VIEW.

F. E. ABBOT, ESQ.:

Dear Sir.—In THE INDEX for Sept. 21, I read an article upon "Swinburne's Poems." Whilst I question not the right of your correspondent to his opinions, yet it was a sad day if Swinburne was the exponent of the true ideas and impulses of our age. Better far the old "Puritan asceticism." I once had the volume called "Laus Veneris;" it is now burnt. Nor is it the only book that lives, yet ought not to live. For an impartial criticism upon this poet, I commend the article in the Eclectic Magazine, April, 1872; and, for breathings of the spirit of the age, the poem of R. H. Stoddard—"Why stand ye gazing into heaven?"

Yours,

WAITER F. JOHNSON.

[We add here the beautiful poem enclosed by our correspondent.—Ed.]

Why stand ye gazing into heaven?
What seek ye there? what hope to find
Beside the clouds which the cold wind
Drives round the world from morn to even?
The wan moon, ploughed with ancient scars?
The gracious sun, the alien star?
The all embracing Space?
Ye look for God?
Have ye beheld him there?
You, or your fathers in their prime?
Or any man, at any time,—
The wick, the good, the fair?
Who has beheld—I will not say his face,
But where his feet have trod?
What have your straining eyes
Discovered in the skies?
Why not look down the Sea?
"Tis deep, and most creative; what eludes
In the upper solitudes,
Still lurking in the lower wastes may be?
Ye look for God, ye tell me. Tell me this:
How know ye that He is?
Because your fathers told ye, no, and they
Because, of old, their fathers told them so;
As it is now, so was it long ago,
And will be when the years have passed away.

Nothing can come from nothing. Well, what then?

The Earth, with all its men,—
The little insect burrowing in the sod,—
Sun, planet, star,
All things that are,
Must have been made by God!
Why made by Him? Who saw them made?
Who saw the deep foundations laid?
The hands that built the wall?
Why made at all?
Why not Eternal,—tell me? Not because
It must created be:
If so Eternal be,
But why Eternal?—why not also This?
Why must the All be His?
It was, and is, and is because it was!

There is no God then? Nay,
You say it, and not I;
I do but ask
We have not yet beheld this God on High:
Not knowing that He is, we live and die!
If we know nothing of Him, yet we feel,
We feel love's kisses sweet,—
The wine that trips our feet,—
The murderous thrust of steel:
Gladness about the heart when the sun breaks,
Or the soft moon is floating on the skies,
Delight in the wild sea, in tranquil lakes,
In every bird that flies;
And but tears in our eyes.
When love, the best of earth, its last kiss over, dies!
But He whom we name God, and grope so far above,
Whose arm, we fear, is Power, whose heart, we hope, is Love.

On the worlds below Him,
In the dust before Him,
We may adore Him,
We cannot know Him.
If, indeed, He be, to bless or curse,
And be not this tremendous Universe!

"Higher than your arrows fly,
Deeper than your plumbeis fall,
Is the Deepest, the Most High,
Is the All in All!"

MASONIC ATHEISM.

MR. ABBOT:

You have asked the question, "Can an atheist become a Mason?" You have been answered that an atheist cannot become a Mason.

This answer is correct so far as it goes. The truth is that each Mason knows himself to be individually responsible not to admit a known atheist; but if by chance or otherwise an atheist does gain admission, or if a Mason becomes such afterwards, there is no Masonic law that I know of which will rid the fraternity of his presence on that pretext alone.

But, Mr. Editor and all other inquiring friends, what is an atheist? I do not know, and venture to assert that neither your definition nor the definition of any one will be accepted as full authority in this matter. The man who simply rejects the Christian idea of God cannot certainly be classed as an atheist. Neither can he be called an atheist simply because he accepts Spencer's theories of the great unknowable. Who then is an atheist? In my ignorance I fall to discriminate in this nice adjustment of thought.

But, Mr. Abbot, in your inquiries in this matter you failed to ask some questions which perhaps might have an important bearing to yourself. I will answer one or two of them without the asking. The grand basis of Masonry is the Holy Bible, and the Mason who doubts the divine origin of that volume, or the efficacy of prayer, will find himself compelled to play the hypocrite thoroughly. I have known many sceptical Masons to do this who have found it to be very unpleasant; it might perhaps be so to you. The time may come, however, when these excrescences will be removed. Of course it is claimed that Masonry does not change in this way, but progressive and intelligent men will and do imbue institutions with their own characteristics, and the Masonic fraternity is eminently composed of men of intelligence and thought and will who are tinctured with theological heresy.

I for one have faith in these secret orders which are scattered over the world. These little isolated brotherhoods are educating and preparing the human family for the great social era soon to come. They are but types of the greater brotherhood to be. And from this standpoint of hope I give them my unreserved sympathy; yet ask them or any one to give such a definition of "atheist" as all will accept.

Yours in truth,

G.

[Our own custom is to call every man an atheist who chooses to call himself so, and nobody else. It is not our business to rebaptize our neighbors. Of course men differ as much in their definitions of atheism as of Christianity, and no one of these is authoritative; but it is as curiously dogmatic to assert the impossibility of atheism as to assert the impossibility of a sincere belief in God. Many assert the one or the other. There is great force in our correspondent's defence of Masonry as an "isolated brotherhood;" and we doubt not that, like the Church, it has done much good. But if one has to co-operate with either at the expense of self-respect or principle, it becomes a duty to leave it. Our own opinion is that it is not brave or uncompromising to submit to a creed which has to be evaded. It is better to stand for the principle of equal freedom at all costs.—Ed.]

ORTHODOX ILL LANGUAGE.

The people who style themselves "Orthodox" are wont to censure the use of what is called "profane language." In this they are quite right; and they are right, further, in saying that thoughtlessness, a careless habit of using such words without meaning any harm by them, is no valid excuse. I wish to suggest to these pious people that their own habitual use of expressions whose purport is false or vicious is as little justified by the fact that they mean no harm by it.

A favorite couplet, frequently made to serve both as hymn and prayer at the close of the prayer-meetings of the "Boston Young Men's Christian Association," is the following:—

"Take my poor heart and let it be Forever closed to all but Thee."

If one who, in that meeting, has been energetically singing these lines as his own petition to Jesus should hear, on going into the street, some vulgar young man saying, "Damn my eyes!" he would at first feel very much shocked; and then, perhaps, he would suggest to the profane young man something about "The Swearer's Prayer," and ask him to reflect what would be his condition if his petition were granted.

Well, the pious man is quite right to make his protest against the foolish and vicious expression above quoted. But he might advantageously make this further reflection, and modify his own future language by it: if both the prayers above-mentioned should at once be granted, the pious man's and the profane man's, the latter would not be worst off of the two. He would lose his eyes—a very serious loss—but he would not lose all his natural affections and sympathies, his love for relatives and friends, his interest in nature, art, science, reform, his desire for the increasing social and political welfare of the community in which he lives. It was bad enough carelessly to ask, without meaning it, that his eyes might be destroyed; but at least he has not incurred the guilt of seriously asking that he might suffer privations and disabilities far exceeding the loss of his eyes.

I received one day in the street, from a worthy and well-meaning man who was distributing papers of the pious sort to the passers-by, a little pictorial sheet entitled "Good Cheer." Examining it after I got home, there appeared in large letters on one of the pages, directly under the title, "Good Cheer," this inscription—"THE WICKED SHALL BE TURNED INTO HELL." The next time I met the giver, I pointed out to him the connection of these sentences, and asked whether he, individually, took a great deal of comfort in reflecting that vast numbers of the human race would suffer eternal torments. His look showed that he comprehended the situation, but he made me no answer. Some time ago, in the morning prayer-meeting of the "Young Men's Christian Association" in Tremont Temple, an elderly member asked prayers for his daughter and his sister, who, he said, were unconverted. He added that they were Universalists, and knew nothing of the joy of believing in Jesus.

Two things are specially noteworthy about this last expression of the pious upholder of a gloomy theology.

1. It is utterly and grossly false that Universalists, as such, "know nothing of the joy of believing in Jesus." They agree with their Orthodox calumniators in the doctrine that Jesus, as the Son of God, has made an atonement for sin, through which all mankind may be saved; but the distinctive and characteristic peculiarity of their faith is a confidence that this atonement will not fail of accomplishment towards even a single individual of the race, and thus that all men will be saved. To Universalists, belief in Jesus is pre-eminently a joyful belief, one in which they can take constant and solid comfort. But—

2. The most astonishing thing about the pious man's statement is the quality, the distinctive character, of that belief which he claims as joy-inspiring.

The word "Gospel" signifies good news. Now, if any theological doctrine in the world may appropriately be called "good news," it is the doctrine that God's plan for the salvation of men will succeed thoroughly, perfectly, and without a single exception. This faith is pre-eminently suited to inspire joy and delight, with thanksgiving and praise to God, in every receiver of it. The Universalist daughter and her Universalist aunt may well be glad, and sing for joy; for they know that not only they, and other true believers of their sort, but their unbelieving father and brother will be saved. But this strangely constituted father and brother—believing that his daughter and his sister may be damned, and meaning, if they are damned, to reconcile himself to it, and not let that fact interfere with his future happiness—has the assurance to set forth his faith as a more joyful one than theirs! Could fanaticism itself possibly go further?

EXAMINER.

UNITARIANISM AND FREEDOM.

A writer in the Monthly Religious Magazine says that Unitarianism is as free as Free Religion, and surpasses it in the contents of its faith, and therefore there is no sufficient reason for the existence of the Free Religious Association.

Without discussing the second rather undefinable question, we assert that Unitarianism is not by any means free. It is but little more so than Orthodoxy. Orthodoxy gives you freedom to something; so does Romanism. That is not perfect freedom. We want freedom not to anything, but simply freedom—freedom to anything or to nothing, to belief or non-belief, to Christ, to Mahomet, to Buddha, to Joe Smith, to Spencer, to anything and anybody, or to nothing and nobody. This is the freedom that must be vindicated for the human race. Does Unitarianism grant such freedom? Assuredly not. It confines to certain results. It has dogmas, a creed, none the less imperative and galling because unwritten. To preach in a Unitarian pulpit, one must keep within certain bounds, he must believe certain things. If he does not, he is ostracized, sentenced to starvation and the outer darkness. The editor of the Christian Register politely hints to him to pack up and leave on the next train.

Unitarianism goes a little ahead of Orthodoxy and then says, with the same severe authority, "Thus far and no farther." Its chains are gilded and have a few more links on them, but they are as securely padlocked. They give one room to dance instead of marching soberly along; but one must dance to a certain tune. A little irregularity is allowed to one who is particularly brilliant and popular with the crowd, but he can go only so far with his tether. The doors of the Unitarian fold do not grate harshly; they turn on golden hinges with a smooth, soft melody, but none the less do they shut one in. We can reject the God head of Christ, but not his divinity; the vicarious atonement, but not his sinlessness; his miraculous conception, but not his Lordship. One set of assumptions is as unfounded as the other, and depends for acceptance altogether upon outward authority.

Now, so long as Unitarianism confines to certain results it is not free, and all its talk about being free is but "a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." Suppose I say that Christ is not so much to me as Shakespeare; suppose I say that Shakespeare has the more comprehensive mind, the deeper insight, that he affords a better religious culture,—am I considered a good Unitarian? Certainly not; hands are lifted in horror! Suppose I adopt the materialistic philosophy as the best explanation of the universe as it strikes me,—am I in full fellowship? Far from it. Unitarianism turns the cold shoulder to many an honest belief. It puts over the entrance to certain ways of thought, "Abandon hope, all ye who enter here, of being in good and regular standing in the Unitarian ministry! Believe this or that, or you will be cast out somehow or other."

So long as Unitarianism adopts this petty method of Orthodoxy, and hedges the road in to certain dogmas, so long is there an imperious reason for the Free Religious Association, and more and more will it gather together the fresh, bright spirits of the time. To win perfect freedom for man in all religious matters is one of the grandest endeavors of the age, and upon its success depend the permanency and glory of our civilization. We hope that Unitarianism, by the logic of events, will drift into this supreme position. It can have a noble and ever broadening future of glorious achievement, or it can sink into a petty denomination whose highest act of heroism is to build a big church for a popular preacher and make Christmas presents to little children.

The world to-day has a very faint conception of what true freedom is. Each soul must be allowed to go into all the multitudinous ways of human thought, up or down, to the right or to the left, through Shakespeare or Spencer or Christ, through the angel or the monkey, through table-flipping or Bible-reading. If one has an honest purpose, the contemplation of the obscurest and most grotesque phenomena in the light of science will lead him to the Infinite Good. The telescope does not measure His throne one way, nor the microscope the other. Christ is but a mere point in His sparkling immensity.

Too many Unitarians like to anchor alongside the big ship Orthodoxy. They dare not tempt the soundless waters, but must be within hailing distance, so that if anything should happen they could hoist the signal of distress and be taken safely on board. For my part, I say, "Spread the sails and see what can be found of freighted continents out upon the great bosom of the deep."

A WESTERN UNITARIAN.

SCIENTIFIC PRAYER AND RELIGION.

The office of the newspaper is to afford the neutral ground on which different shades of thought may reveal themselves. Many an editor forgets that his duty is not to set each correspondent right, but primarily to let him speak. Generally when this is done, the discriminating mind finds the average easily, and is pushed forward by the opposing forces.

It is seldom that two articles appear side by side that so perfectly resist each other as two in the issue of THE INDEX for Sept. 31.

I read with interest and satisfaction the article of T. W. H. on "Praying at a Mark," and I could but mark that the best and most discriminating protest against the "praying" proposal which I have yet seen comes from one who sympathizes so perfectly with the probable attitude of the proposer, and declares in this article that he has little faith in the efficacy of prayer as an agency. No shocked believer has so adequately met the suggestion, or parried the challenge, as this non-believer. We all doubtless felt a little shiver at the coldness and boldness of the proposition; but probably all confessed that, as an argumentum ad hominem, the thrust was irresistible.

As I passed in the next column to the article, "Scientific Theology, Again," I recognized the presence of that pure spirit which needs not to add his initials to make himself known. But as I read, "Let the scientific method be applied to religion, and, as Mr. Hall says, in religion, as elsewhere, science would have no theories in advance of proofs,"—as I read this, I heard the echo of the former column, "The weak point of the position appears to be this, that it brings merely physical tests into the region of the emotions." "If the scientific method falls so utterly when we approach the domain of the emotions, it is hopeless to propose it in a matter which eminently includes the emotional element." I found this line of argument so satisfactory in the first column, equally operative in the second.

It strikes me also that the last paragraph of the second article makes an enormous demand in behalf of "pure freedom of thought." It asks Mr. Washburn to produce theological students who begin their study with perfectly free minds, with no predisposing bias in favor of the thought into which they were born, and which was in all their passive mental period been their life. Do scientists begin with such mental attitude? Do they not often begin their work in support of some accepted position or hypothesis, and find themselves led elsewhere? And is it not a sufficiently "pure freedom of thought" if they on conviction yield that predisposition, and go where the results lead?

More considerate than this demand was the process of the metaphysician in the story, who said to his class, "Now, brethren, think the wall. Have you thought?" "Yes." "Now, then, think that which thinks the wall." Let us begin somewhere; let us have at first even a leaning to the wall. We cannot well swallow ourselves to get rid of all localizations.

The writer recognizes this difficulty. "In a country," he says, "where Christianity is the generally recognized religion, and people are born into it as they are born into democracy, it is one of the most difficult things in the world to get into the attitude of mental freedom with regard to its character and claims. Yet this must be done before theological study can be made truly scientific."

It cannot be done. Mental constitution, education, habit, all forbid that this should be the attitude at the beginning. This antecedent abstraction of thought, this denial of the predispositions, is not practised by the scientist, even in the most external and material interests. Let it not be demanded in theology.

Progress in truth is progress in discrimination; and when the scientific method is recommended to the use of the church, let the just discrimination be made between religion and theology. In the latter let us be satisfied with methods as neutral and honest as are had in other departments of investigation; but let us not confuse ourselves with talking about science in religion. These are not strictly convertible terms, though often used as such. The clergy may say to the scientist as in the close of the former article the scientist is supposed to say to the clergy, "Hands off! You insist on bringing your methods of reasoning into our house where they do not belong. You do not like it when we bring our methods into your domain, where they are, no doubt, quite as inappropriate."

E. C. L. B.

KEOKUK, IOWA, Sept. 20.

SYSTEM.

"Have you Auerbach's On the Heights?" I asked the librarian of one of our available literary institutions in this "holy city of churches." "Yes," was the reply, "but you must hunt it up, as the books are not catalogued."

Vain search amidst shelves of books tumbled about in an intellectual chaos! The volume was not lost, but practically it was in the same condition as the child's toy, which he affirmed could not be lost because it was in a known place—the bottom of the sea!

This little incident aroused thought. Here was a goodly collection of reading material, from which could be extracted the choicest nuggets of spiritual gold; but bound as we are by the inevitable limits of time, this very quantity of hoarded brain labor, in the condition in which it was, served but to increase the difficulty of its profitable manipulation.

This thought otherwise transposed would be, that the time lost in searching after the tools would exceed their beneficial use when found.

System is absolutely essential in man's operations, because his mind is baffled in the search amongst the merely multitudinous. Our intellectual strivings are ever towards the comprehension of a system or unity in all things. For what do they but unlock the bewildering store-houses of nature and art? The scientist tabulates his observed facts, and therefrom evolves his theory of this very system and unity which we desire. By this lantern he lights his way to further researches.

In practical life the same holds good. What were a great city to a stranger, but a babel of sounds and confusion worse confounded, of houses and people, without the simple key to it all, the directory? And what is this but the reduction to system of disorder?

In human life, the few principles of our spiritual nature pressed upon the attention from birth are the means whereby we judge with general correctness the character of our neighbors. Among our innumerable deeds done science finds the few leading springs, which enable us to foretell and in some measure to explain those not yet committed. As exemplifying this, does not Political Economy base itself upon one trait of human nature—selfishness? And are not Ethics based upon still another—disinterestedness?

The necessity, then, of means to unravel the complexity and confusion of the uncalculated and the unknown, is evident. And in proportion as they are multiplied in one direction and simplified in another, so will the problems of humanity be the more easily solved and the better understood.

JOSEPH SINGER.

CHICAGO, Ill.

A gentleman who came up the Hudson on the St. John yesterday, tells this story:—

"I noticed," he said, "a serious-looking man, who looked as if he might have been a clerk or a book-keeper. The man seemed to be caring for a crying baby, and was doing everything he could to still its sobs. As the child became restless in the berth, the gentleman took it in his arms and carried it to and fro in the cabin. The sobs of the child irritated a rich man who was trying to read, until he blurted out loud enough for the father to hear—

"What does he want to disturb the whole cabin with that d-d baby for?"

The man only nestled the baby more quietly in his arms without saying a word. Then the baby sobbed again.

"Where is the confounded mother that she don't stop its noise?" continued the profane grumbler.

At this the father came up to the man and said: 'I am sorry we disturb you, sir, but my dear baby's mother is in her coffin down in the baggage room! I'm taking her back to Albany where we used to live.'

"The hard-hearted man," says my friend, "buried his face in shame, but in a moment, wilted by the terrible rebuke, he was by the side of the grief-stricken father. They were both tending the baby."—Ell Perkins in the New York Advertiser.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT

Digitized by Google

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, OCTOBER 19, 1872.

WHOLE NO. 147.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ARBOT, Editor.
ABRAHAM WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.

OTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HODGKINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLGREN, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENET, ROY. CHARLES VOTSEY (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

[For THE INDEX.]

On Pain and Moral Evil.---I.

A SERMON PREACHED IN ST. GEORGE'S HALL, LONDON,
DECEMBER 17, 1871.

BY THE REV. CHAS. VOYSEY.

"He will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations."—ISAIAH, XLV. 7.

In almost all ancient prophecy similar to that of my text, there are distinct elements—the local and the universal, the temporary and the abiding, the formal and the essential. In that which is merely local, temporary, and formal, we cannot be expected to feel the same interest as in that which is universal, abiding, and essential. We can only with difficulty cast ourselves back into the remote past so as to enter into the circumstances, and sympathize with the feelings, of the men of old time, and to that extent we must be the losers; we must forego a considerable amount of benefit which otherwise we should have gained from a more minute knowledge of the writers and of their peculiar surroundings.

Still we can, I think, make good use of many of those noble words of ancient prophecy in which the Hebrew scriptures abound. Enough light is still left to show the suitableness of the words to the season and to enable us to apply them afresh to circumstances in our own times which are nearly parallel. The words of my text have less in them than we commonly find of what is local and temporary, the only instance of it being found in the phrase, "In this mountain," where the prophet, manifestly referring to Mount Zion, speaks of it as the centre from which God's great unveiling of himself should flow. It may be a mere poetical phrase, of course, but the context seems to me to give it a position of greater importance, and it is more likely to refer to some actual occurrence—some great conquest over a foe which Israel was to celebrate in the citadel of Jerusalem. However this may be, we pass over what is merely local and temporary in the prediction, and direct our thoughts to what is universal and abiding. "The Lord will destroy . . . the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations."

We will first consider the assumption of the prophet as to the covering and the veil spread over all people, and next his own glorious anticipation of its removal.

He assumes that there is a covering cast over all people and a veil spread over all nations.

Elsewhere this writer speaks of a people who "walked in darkness," and of men who "dwelt in the land of the shadow of death"—figures as mournful as they are true. To any intelligent mind it must be needless to explain that this covering, veil, darkness, is nothing else than ignorance. Ignorance, itself only a negation, is best expressed by a negative emblem such as "darkness." One who does not know a given subject is said to "be in the dark about it." Knowledge is called the "light of truth." It reveals not merely objects previously unperceived, but it enables us to discern accurately the relations of those objects to each other. The order of Nature is first darkness, then light—first ignorance, then knowledge—the positive taking the place of the negative. This has been the law in the development of mankind as a race, just as it is the law of our development as individuals. There has been first the covering of darkness, the veil of ignorance followed, not by the full light of day, but at all events by the gleam of dawn, the twilight which ushers in the rising sun.

But it is not of general ignorance and general knowledge that I would now speak, but of one particular branch of human thought, suggested as it is by the whole chapter from which my text is taken. The prophet had begun with a song of praise for some national deliverance, and from that he goes further and wider in his sympathies for all mankind, as though he had been led by his own personal or national anxieties to think about the rest of his fellow-men, who, quite as much as himself and his countrymen, needed a "strength in their distress, a refuge from the storm." I do not wish to put a meaning into the prophet's words which does not belong to them; but it seems almost certain that his expressions about the "covering" and the "veil spread over all people" had a special reference to the darkness of men's minds about the dealings of God, and their erroneous interpretations of the meaning and purport of suffering. If you refer to the preceding chapter, you will find just the same sentiments of horror and dread as those with which some of our Advent preachers are at this moment terrifying or trying to terrify their congregations. "Fear and the pit and the snare are upon thee, O inhabitants of the earth! and it shall come to pass that he who fleeth from the noise of the fear shall fall into the pit, and he that cometh up out of the midst of the pit shall be taken in the snare. . . . The earth is utterly broken down, the earth is clean dissolved, the earth is moved exceedingly."

This is only a fragment, but enough to show that for the time being, while trouble was pressing upon him, the world looked black with threatening storm, and the prophet poured out his fear and despair from the thick darkness of his own soul. By and by the clouds clear away. God's purposes have been unfolded, and he knows now that all that dismal foreboding was purely imaginary—the result of an overpowering darkness which paralyzed him for action, and peopled his brain with incoherent horrors and spectres. The cheerful light of day has driven those repulsive forms into the outer darkness, made clear to him things as they are and himself as he is, and brought back the healthy calm of a well-ordered mind, steadfast, reflecting, hopeful. He alludes then, as I think, to his own dismal view of this life and this life's troubles as a covering—a veil spread over the souls of men which prevents their seeing things as they are.

Was he right in thinking this veil of ignorance universal? Most assuredly. There is not a religion in the wide world which has not had its basis in this necessary ignorance. If one might make an exception anywhere, it would be the exalted theocracy of some of the Hebrew psalmists and prophets; but the mass of the people around them shared the universal ignorance of the world at large in looking at human affairs with a desponding eye, and in murmuring against the decrees of Providence whenever they showed the darkside of his most righteous control. Making some allowances for exceptions, then, it is very nearly literally true that a covering has been cast over all people, and a veil spread over all nations, by which the events of life have been darkened, and the prospects of human destiny have been overclouded.

The main religions of the world start from the assumption that there is something wrong somewhere; that the good purpose of a good God has been thwarted; that there is war in heaven; that a raging rebel spirit, nearly omnipotent, has hurled his defiance in the face of the Holy One, and that they are now engaged in a deadly encounter of which we men and women are the helpless victims. The religions of the world, I say, begin their earliest catechisms with lessons of gloom, and end them with lessons of despair. Not a sorrow in the world, not a tear shed, not an aching limb, not a burdened heart, but is set down to the devil, or to some agency hostile to all that is beneficent and good. Sin and sorrow are joined together in unholy bonds, to confound our moral sense, and to bring discredit to the Most High. The religions of the world, for the most part, teach us to think human life at best an awful lottery; to many it is made to seem a positive curse which may end,—nay, which cannot end, but must be lived out to the farthest horizon of eternity in accumulating torment, and then, when the point is reached, must be repeated forever and forever, the dull certainty and hopeless impossibility of change being the chief of its unendurable pangs.

But if we turn our backs on such pictures and call them heathenish (remember that during Advent thousands are saying all these awful things and worse than these, and saying them too, to the young), if we repudiate them, is the most enlightened Orthodox teaching free from that mournful view of life and its sorrow which we can only describe as darkness? I fear not. How rarely do we hear little children taught from earliest infancy the blessedness of sufferings and disappointments! Not from the pulpit can we gather such moralizing over the ills of life as will help our feeble footsteps over one of the rugged byways. The only sufferings which are praised and recommended are those of asceticism and puritanical austerity, which do no one any good. The aches and pains which come to us in the course of nature seldom form a text for the thanksgiving of the preacher. But I do not mean hereby to say that no religious teachers have dwelt upon the sanctity and the blessedness of sorrow. They would strangely have missed a great portion of Bible teaching, had they done so entirely. True, they have many of them said and sung the most beautiful things about the blessedness of sorrow; but then this was only for the elect, for the true believer, for the faithful sons and daughters of Mother Church. To all outsiders no blessing can come through affliction except their possible conversion to some particular form of Orthodoxy through fear of hell. But all their best teaching is vitiated by their tracing pain to the sin of Adam, to an implied defeat of God's purposes. We were trained to look at all sorrowful events from our side—our human, earthly, narrow side of the question. We feel a present pain, and we can only call it by its right name and be impatiently restless till it is removed. But if we would be more than animals or mere children, if we would be men, we ought to school ourselves to quite a different mode of regarding the sufferings of life, and to accustom ourselves to look on pain in all its forms as serving a purpose in the plans of an almighty and all-wise Father, quite as indispensable and sacred as that of his choicest gifts.

Physical pain itself would be wonderfully mitigated by such a view of its purpose. We see this illustrated by the man who will plunge the red-hot iron into his own bleeding and poisoned arm, nerved for the fearful infliction simply by the strong belief that it is the only way to save his life. And so, were we to have this veil removed from the sorrows and sufferings of life, and see behind it the necessary benefit they are designed to secure to us, we should be physically fortified to endure them, and they would lose more than half their sting. It is hardly fair to blame the religions of the world for fostering the idea that sorrow and suffering are hostile to men and foreign to God's government, without noticing that many who have renounced religion altogether take the same view and are quite as impatient of evil as the most Orthodox believer in the "Roaring Lion." Religious and irreligious alike, the world at large is yet not developed enough to embrace that optimism which reconciles man both to his present lot and to any discipline or sorrow which has yet to come. But one and all will surely admit that it would be a very grand thing to believe, if it were only true. One and all would welcome, as a light from heaven, any testimony which would assure their hearts that not one single event, modification, or change ever happens by chance; that all things, the minutest as well as the most vast of Nature's operations, are the result of deliberate forethought and design, and therefore everything has been provided for and fixed in its proper place in the long chain of destiny, by one who is not merely almighty, but also all-wise and infinitely good. They would be only too glad to be convinced that no harm could by any possibility ever touch them, that no pain should be purposeless, that no sorrow should be fruitless of abiding joy, no disappointment or loss should fail to carry with it a gratification unspeakably higher and better. Who would not be glad to believe this of the events of life, not merely for himself, but for every one dear to him?

Now I say not only that such a belief is reasonable, but that any other view of human life is incompatible with a belief in the goodness, or wisdom, or power of God. If any real harm, any permanent, incurable, unmitigated mischief can befall you or me, then that is so much subtracted either from the ability of God to take care of us, or from his wisdom in arranging for the contingencies arising out of manifold forces, or from the fidelity of his loving regard for his children who are dependent on his care. The world saw this long ago, and as they objected to the ills of life, not knowing their value, they invented a devil to take all the blame, which was the most absurd possible way of limiting the power, wisdom, and goodness of God, all the while they were pretending that in these qualities God was infinite. This myth of the devil only put back farther into the darkness the great difficulty it was intended to solve. If Satan were not infinite like God, then he was created. If the devil was not created, then God was not infinite. If the devil was made in such a way that in course of time he would, or might, become a source of injury to some of God's creatures, then God is responsible for every grain of that injury. He could neither have been all-wise nor all-good if he created the devil at all. I make no apology for dwelling on this A B C of inquiry into God's dealings. It is absolutely essential to a proper view of the ills of life to know where the blame for them, if any, really lies. The religions of the world dare not face the truth; they are committed to a theory which is transparently absurd as an explanation of sorrow, yet they cannot forego it lest they should speak blasphemy.

But I think the prophet Isaiah would not have hesitated to lay at the Creator's door all the ills that flesh is heir to. And I do not hesitate to say in the face of my God and of this congregation, that God and God alone is ultimately responsible for every and the most minute event, good or evil, which has befallen any one of his creatures. Of course there is no blasphemy here, because I have been all this while urging you to disbelieve in absolute evil—to believe only in good—to take a wiser view than the world and the churches take of things painful and unpleasant—to perceive behind every cloud which hangs over your life the smiles and assurances of a Father's loving purpose. Everything is holy; everything is in its place. Our very darkness and gloom have served their turn in the discipline and development of mankind; even our false creeds and our unwholesome fear of the devil have not been destitute of lessons of eternal and priceless value. The prophet's bright dream seems drawing near to its fulfilment. On every hand and from all parts of the world we are receiving tokens of a happier, and, let us add, a nobler view of human life and destiny. The wreck-and-rescue theory is dying out; the progress theory is taking its place. The more clearly men perceive that there is no room for chance anywhere in the universe, the more certain are their convictions that everything is done or allowed from a good motive, and must ultimately have a beneficial result. And the most remarkable feature of the whole case is that men are learning these happier lessons about the dealings of God by their own more devoted exertions in well-doing. As they do more and strive more to promote the welfare of their fellow-creatures, the scales fall from their eyes, the mists melt and disperse under the genial warmth; the clouds are rolled back, and the glorious sun, the sun of righteousness, arises with healing on his wings, bringing strength, consolation, and hope. Men intent on making the best of this life, of using every opportunity of doing good which comes in their path, begin naturally to believe in a God whose every purpose must be good, and whose transforming power is inexhaustible. They pass out of darkness into a marvellous light, they wake up out of the old-world nightmare of a fallen race, a doomed world, and a triumphant devil, to see that under God's loving and guiding hand human beings have been marching upwards and onwards with steady pace, have been growing out of purblind infancy into childhood, out of childhood into boyhood, and so on, still ever advancing and helped all along from stage to stage by those very agencies of pain and shame which once we thought so hostile, and which cast a threatening gloom over the pathway of mankind. The curse is now seen to be a blessing; the doom is read as the charter of our hopes. Every throb of pain tells now of God's ceaseless and tender regard; every thrust of remorse is God's touch to remind us that we are his; every sigh of regret bears witness of hope which cannot deceive us; every farewell which rends the fibres of our affection is a pledge of everlasting love.

My friends, let us remember that the covering is the fog which has risen out of our own atmosphere; that the veil has been woven out of our own fears by our own superstitions; and that we must rend it for ourselves. The warmth of God's countenance shining behind our clouds will soon dissolve them; but we must do our part likewise to clear our own vision and to remove our own veil. We must think more about others and less about ourselves; we must watch more closely the facts of life and the footsteps of God as he leaves his track upon the pathway of humanity; we must learn to give him as much credit for good intentions as we would give to our most trusty friend on earth, and seek to know what his goodness must be by doing all the good we ever can. "Then shall our light break forth as the morning, and our darkness as the noonday." "He will swallow up death in victory, and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces, and the rebuke of his people will he take away from off all the earth, for the Lord hath spoken it."

HEATHENISM AT A PREMIUM.

[From the Churchman.]

The Archbishop of Canterbury has been good-naturedly ridiculed for what he said concerning the presence of the heathen in London. It was held to be a stretch of imagination, more akin to Hibernian than to Caledonian descent, when he pictured the handful of Eastern heathens converting or influencing the millions of London.

All this gentle fun and arithmetical acuteness may no doubt be very delightful to the average reader who loves to see dignitaries, especially archbishops, at fault; but we fancy that his Grace knew well enough what he meant. Most Scotchmen do, especially men of like position with his Grace.

In the first place, the Archbishop took into account that these heathen were noble and wealthy. Now it is all but impossible to limit the possible influence of a title and money upon English society. Whoever has read the Newcomes of Thackeray, will remember the lively picture of the Hindu banker in London. The "best society" of London has an influence upon the circles beneath it which American readers can but faintly imagine.

The conversion of one peer or peeress to Brahminism would be felt more or less through the United Kingdom. We do not suppose that such conversion is very likely, but we do suppose that some result about which we shall speak presently may follow.

The nature of English social life is peculiar, and any material effect wrought upon the West End of London may be considered as reaching down through all classes, just as certainly as a rise or fall in the headwaters of a river would be felt all the way to its mouth.

Now what is the effect on the upper classes of this infusion of heathenism? Just what the Archbishop says. Those who are received into intimate social relations have their prejudices deferred to, their habits tolerated, their opinions examined. There is, we have no doubt, a social verdict rendered in their favor, that "after all they are not such bad fellows; quite as good in their way as most Christians." This may not advance heathenism, but it is very likely to weaken Christianity.

It is this the Archbishop fears,—the spread, through these subtle influences, of the belief which is but too much in accordance with much modern speculation, that religion does not much matter, anyway. Toleration is very well as a preventative of persecution, but it is not an absolute virtue. It is a fruit which rots as soon as it is over-ripe.

A century ago, the moral tone of the aristocracy of England was very bad. But the great middle class was independent and sound. If its code was not high, it was well enforced. English life was far more isolated than now, and the great body of the nation had little chance to know what pranks its hereditary legislators might choose to play in the clubs and at its country houses. Now all the poison of the head is diffused through the system. Hence, high-bred indifference is sure to be copied. If it be the mind of May Fair that on the whole the Bible is not much more credible than the Koran, it will soon be the fate of regions further East to be like-minded.

Now be it understood this is not a contest between modes of faith. For there—

Let senseless bigots fight,
He can't be wrong whose life is in the right, especially if he be also Rajah of Bangalore, and possess an income of £100,000 per annum.

It means the growth of a belief that beliefs are of little matter. It means letting one's creed slip from one's fingers, because "what are creeds after all?" This is a comparative easy progress. It requires no examination, no comprehension of arguments. A judge may need some mind to pronounce a decision, but none at all to dismiss all parties with the sentence, "I can't understand any of you; go, and don't bother me."

There is the more temptation to this, since the less creed one has the more unembarrassed is the dealing with the opportunities presented by the world and the flesh.

Ultra-toleration has become a dangerous thing. There is no doubt that the power of Christianity has always lain quite as much in its manifest superiority as a rule of moral life over every other, as in the arguments which prop up its evidence. These are taken usually at second-hand, while the other is witnessed and felt. But in the instance given above, heathenism is in its best clothes on a visit. Its inevitable vice is all left at home; it appears in delicate robes and priceless jewels, while Christianity is in its London work-day suit, smirched, torn, and soiled.

This is what we mean by heathenism at a premium.

At the great exhibition of 1857 (the Crystal Palace World's Fair), London sent all its soldiers out of town and displayed itself ostentatiously to the astonished continental visitor as a city without a bayonet. The Archbishop of Canterbury seems to fear that a like spiritual defencelessness is now being shown in utter abandon of courtesy to the heathen guests of England.

He may be over-cautious, but he is evidently reasoning upon a state of religious indifference which he finds far from healthy.

We do not, of course, pretend to say whether he is right or not, but we have ventured a few remarks, to try to show that at all events he is not ridiculous.

THE SOURCES OF CHRISTIANIZATION.

[By Gail Hamilton, in the N. Y. Independent.]

The Missionary Board demands that the missionary shall agree, fourthly, "to observe and keep the rules and regulations of both of the Discipline and the Missionary Manual in their present form, or as they may from time to time be changed hereafter; and also to be governed and guided by the general committee and board of managers of the Missionary Society of the [Infallible Apostolic] Church, and by the bishop having charge of the mission, giving due heed to the instructions and suggestions which they from time to time may send in regard to plans and operations."

"A man I know,
But shall not discover."

is wont to terminate all discussions on female suffrage with the terse and intelligible declaration: "Madame, the end of the matter is this: We have got you down, and we mean to keep you down!"

Very much of this sort seems the attitude of the Apostolic Church toward its missionary. They swear him in for life, and they bind him to observe and keep not only the rules as they now exist, but as they may from time to time be changed hereafter. They do not demand from him a declaration of beliefs in the infallibility of the Board; but they demand a promise which he ought not to give unless the Board is infallible. Of actual rules he can form a judgment, and such he may intelligently agree to obey; but a rule which is not made he cannot agree to keep, except by divesting himself of his manhood, and following a Board as blindly as the most bigoted Roman Catholic follows the Pope. No matter how preposterous a rule some subsequent revolutionary Board may lay down, he has bound himself beforehand to obey it, and has not even the alternative of resignation. No Romanist requirement is more unreasonable than this. He promises—

5. "To refrain from making known his grievances in communicating with his friends, and especially in writing to newspapers; to avoid calling in question, in any public way, the policy, plans, or spirit of the missionary administration at home; reserving his opinions or complaints for the general committee, the board of managers, or the bishops having jurisdiction severally in the premises, according to the nature of the case."

(Signed by the Bishops.)

With a single exception, the good bishops have taken every available method of securing order in Warsaw. But they should have made the candidate agree—

6. Never to put his printed commission into his hat, and especially never to suffer the wind to blow hard enough to blow his hat off, and whirl his commission into the hands of strangers, especially the newspapers, and thus prevent calling in question in any public way the intelligence, policy, or effectiveness of the missionary administration at home.

This wise regulation was not inserted, though it may be one of those future rules which he has constructively agreed to observe. We have, therefore, the opportunity to remark that the objection which lies against this commission is that it is founded on the opposite of intelligence. It appeals to ignorant and undiscriminating piety, and in proportion as a man is wise, in proportion as he understands the meaning and use of words, the limits of thought and obligation, the freedom and dignity of the individual, he rejects it, not only with decision, but with scorn. In direct ratio with his fitness to be a missionary is the impossibility of his agreeing to the condition of becoming one.

No man, no committee of intelligence would make it incumbent on any one to agree to support a contingent discipline. The first requirement of reason is that the mind shall clearly understand the articles to which it subscribes. The Board demands that its servants shall support an unstated proposition, either from a lack of sufficient mental acuteness to see the absurdity of such a thing, or from a dishonorable disposition to take advantage of a similar presumed lack on the part of the candidate. The wise man refuses to be thus blindly bound. It is only the unthinking who are caught.

Again, when a man agrees to "report his acceptance in writing to the missionary secretaries, and place himself under their direction as to the time of sailing, the mode of conveyance, and the preparation for the voyage," he agrees to something definite, intelligible, practicable. But when he agrees "to go out deeply imbued with the love of Christ and of souls, profoundly impressed with the danger, the folly, and the guilt of men in heathendom, fully sensible of his call from God to preach the Gospel, and of his constant dependence on Divine Grace to qualify him for the great work," he agrees to be knows not what. Whose lead and line shall be used in fathoming his love, to tell whether it be deep or shallow? And suppose the party of the second part should at some future time affirm that the party of the first had violated his contract, and was not deeply imbued, or profoundly impressed, or fully sensible, how is the latter to prove or disprove it? It makes a contract regarding possessions which are intangible, immeasurable, incapable of being made the objects of contract. He agrees at a certain future time to be in a certain state of mind. The committee stipulate for emotions. The state of mind may be a very proper one, and the emotions highly becoming to the occasion; but neither the understanding which requires nor that which subscribes to these conditions is of a lofty or discriminating order. The commission is a medley of possibilities and impossibilities, of Divine Grace and human botch, of sentiment and steamers. The only pleasant feature of the whole form is the painful, scrupulous, ever-vigilant care taken to repress insurrection and secure obedience. Evidently, the venerable bishops have had a hard time of it. Apparently, the heathen have not given them half as much trouble as the brethren. These missionaries must be a restive set. The managers have but a passing word upon the perils of pagans; but they exhaust the resources of ingenuity in building barricades against the machinations of the men who are conspiring to convert them. One word for the glory of God is followed by ten for that of the board of managers. It is very well for the missionaries and the heathen to depend upon Divine Grace; but the bishops want it down in black and white. They lift one eye to the hills whence cometh their help; but they keep the other on the valleys, to see that no unruly brother take advantage of their devoutness, to indulge in revolt against their dominion. In one breath the candidate agrees that he will be imbued with the love of Christ; in the next that he will be well affected toward the Church authorities. Not a religious plank is brought forward for the platform, but this labored board is sure to be bobbing behind it. Between the secretaries and the manuals, the general committees and the board of managers, the bishops and other clergy, the missionary must sometimes be hard pushed to know which king it is to whom he has sworn allegiance.

And the worst of it is that he cannot have the comfort of writing home to his sweetheart about it. If the board cannot prevent the formation of steam, it can at least shut down the valves and prevent its escape. The Rev. Mr. Brown may grumble about the stupidity of Secretary Smith in sending him around the Horn, instead of across the continent; but he shall not permit his grumbling to reverberate in Isabella's epistles. The board fears its missionaries even in writing love letters. Its model correspondent would be the laconic young man who, being commissioned to break gently to distant parents the tidings of their son's slaughter by wild beasts, fulfilled his mission by writing—

"Mr. A—: Dear Sir, A coyote has eaten your son's head off."

In short, if we were to judge from this commission, we should say that the missionary force consisted of two parties: the board of managers, which stays at home, and whose work is chiefly and constantly a fierce struggle to maintain and perpetuate its own supreme power; and the missionaries proper, who go abroad, and whose chief industry is to distract the councils, neutralize the action, and destroy the authority of the board. We might also hazard the conjecture that between the upper and the nether millstone the heathen would be ground exceeding small.

CHRISTIANITY AND HEATHENISM IN INDIA.—The Rev. L. W. Aldrich, formerly a missionary resident in India, but now stationed in Revere, delivered a lecture in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Union last evening, upon "Christianity and Heathenism in India," which consisted of a review of life in India as seen by the speaker himself. He said he saw ten thousand Christians in Calcutta, made up of government officials and natives of other countries, and he drew a gloomy picture of the present condition of the country, owing to the misrule of Great Britain. It was his candid opinion that the chief obstacle to the growth of true Christianity lay in the fact that the natives were oppressed and maltreated by the English officials, and he inferred from the assassination that had lately taken place that a great uprising was close at hand. He was sure of one thing, that there was an intense feeling of hatred against the government and the entire Christian population. In the matter of morality, he considered the Hindu by far the superior to his conqueror, who practised polygamy and all the other sins of social life with impunity, and denounced and punished the inhabitants who dared to work and support more than one wife. Missionaries could do but little to stem the tidal wave of unchristian influences wrought by officials, until a radical change was wrought in the rule of the place, for the natives only heard the one class speak of evil doing, while they saw the bad deeds of the other. He considered that there was a vast amount of corruption and fraud in missionary work, and that its general tendency was to impede rather than advance the cause of Christianity. On the whole, it was a work of corruption rather than of regeneration. Converts were bought for small sums of money, and when he first landed he was rather surprised to find a man ready to be baptized and join his church for two and a half dollars a month, which was fifty cents more than he had been receiving from another minister of the gospel. He afterwards found hundreds of the lower caste of people who were ready to do the same thing, and also found missionaries ready to buy them up in order to increase the statistics of their work for home perusal. Of course this had a very bad effect upon the higher and the better class of people. Then advantage was taken of hunger and want, and as an instance of this he stated that an English bishop bought up several hundreds of starving people, and thereby caused much joy among the religious population of England when the report of so much good done at one stroke arrived there. It was his belief that the natives of India have as much Christianity in them as have the inhabitants of any nation he had ever visited. At least he would as soon trust his interests to their care as to any people; he had formed a very high opinion of both their faith and the manner in which it was observed; he had the idea that the religion of India would be a help rather than a hindrance to Christianity, for the Hindu image was far from a hopeless or a godless sign. Of the Mohammedans or the Mussulmans the preacher spoke very highly, chiefly on account of their religious character. The address was brought to an abrupt close on account of the lateness of the hour.—Boston Advertiser, of Oct. 7.

CHARLES VOYSEY.—A paragraph in your journal this morning, about a visit an English editor made lately to a clergyman who feeds and clothes a family of ten on an income of one hundred and fifty pounds a year, reminds me of a talk I had with Rev. Charles Voysey, in the summer of 1871. He was then a clergyman in the Church of England, and was rector of a church which gave him a very fair living; but, before this, he had been a curate in London, with a very large family (as ministers generally have), and an income of less than a hundred pounds a year—not more than eighty, if my memory serves me. It was desperate work, he said, to make both ends meet,—so desperate that there came a time when there was not a penny or a crust left in the house, or a pint of milk for the bairns. "Then," he said, "I sat down to think what I should do; and, when I had made up my mind about the course I must take, I went up to my wife—as noble and true a woman as ever this world heard of—and said, 'My dear, we have done our very best, and this is the end. Now I will tell you what we must do. We are citizens of London, have paid our rates and taxes right along, and are entitled to all the help there is. We will go to the poor-house to-morrow morning, and ask them to take us in. We have a perfect right to go there, and we will go.' She said, 'That is right,' and began at once to get ready to go to the poor-house; but that day I got a letter from some one, inclosing five pounds. There was no signature; I don't know to this day who sent it, but that five pounds saved us from taking that step, and tided us over to quarter day." I could not help wishing, when I heard the tale from the mouth of the poor, brave, earnest man,—a true gentleman as he is, a hard-worker, a scholar, and in all respects fitted for his great office,—that he had been compelled to go to the poor-house of his parish, because I think it would have been like a stroke of lightning in its power to split open the secret of the suffering such men have to bear, and take something from the gorged channels through which the wealth of the English Episcopal Church drifts into the pockets and stomachs of a few of the most favored, who can for many reasons get hold of public or private patronage, and give a fair share of it to those who have to do the hard work.—Rev. Robert Collyer, in Chicago Tribune.

SPENCER VERSUS MARTINEAU.—Herbert Spencer replies to Mr. Martineau's critique on the philosophy of evolution, in the Popular Science Monthly, for July. He points out what he conceives to be the scientific misapprehensions of the theologian respecting the simple elements of Nature, and puts in a general demurrer against his conclusions. But the most important things in his paper are his absolute disclaimer of materialism, and his statement of the close proximity of his views to those of his critic. According to Mr. Spencer, Mr. Martineau imagines he understands the cause behind the phenomena of evolution, while Mr. Spencer does not. Furthermore, Mr. Spencer fails to see how piety is exemplified or furthered by the assertion that the universe contains no mode of existence higher than that revealed in our consciousness; he thinks humility is better shown by confessing our incompetence to grasp in thought the cause of all things. But

Mr. Martineau has distinctly disclaimed the ability of the finite to comprehend the infinite. He does not pretend to understand Deity in the sense of knowing either the mode or the contents of his being. At the most he claims to have a qualitative apprehension of what it would be the height of arrogance and absurdity to claim to comprehend. We fall to see the essential antagonism between the views of these thinkers; for Mr. Spencer has the least possible sympathy with those who imagine that they have found out all mysteries and abolished Deity altogether. Probably he has no more regard than Mr. Martineau for the popular materialistic conceit that science has reduced creation to a very simple and intelligible affair; given next-to-nothing and a law of development to begin with, with time enough thrown in to the account, and we have all there is. And even allowing that what seems simple elements to-day may prove to be compound ones to-morrow, the admission in no way invalidates Mr. Martineau's claim that nothing can be evolved which was not first involved. The oak must be in the acorn before it can be evolved from it. Evolution is a process but not the cause, and only pushes the mystery of things one step further back.—Golden Age.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at OXFORD HALL, St. Clair Street, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Cash Receipts for the week ending October 12.—C. M. Stiles, $10; E. C. Stiles, $10; P. N. Miller, 60 cts.; J. F. Ruggles, $3.40; A. J. Grover, $2.50; Dion Thomas, $20.00; J. L. Leman, $10.00; B. W. Pierce, $100.00; D. Thorne, $10.00; M. B. Bryant, $20.00; Joseph S. Smith, 20 cts.; R. M. Meilen, 50 cts.; Rev. E. H. Hall, 40 cts.; Joshua Bell, 25 cts.; Mrs. W. A. Clark, $1; W. P. H. Youngman, 10 cts.; C. W. S. $3.50; P. Carter, 50 cts.; M. W. Ayres, 10 cts.; Rev. F. W. Webster, 50 cts.; Francis M. Eddy, 25 cts.; S. A. Porter, 30 cts.; E. Hall, 10 cts.; Nelson Thwing, 10 cts.; H. Martin, 15 cts.; J. A. J. Wilcox, 15 cts.; Mrs. M. N. Adams, $10.00; Mrs. E. Crosby, $10; E. C. Stiles, $2; A. T. Garrison, $10; T. A. Kinney, $2.50; Geo. S. Winslow, $3; H. Apthorp, $3; John Hobart, $1; Alex. Hobart, $1; Parker Pillsbury, $2; A. J. Grover, $2.50; C. B. Pritch, $1.50; J. Leman, $2; B. W. Pierce, $2; Benj. S. Price, $3; Welner Bros., $1; Fred. Beck, $3; Merritt Trimble, $3; Geo. H. Stevens, $1; N. Littlefield, $3; J. A. Hill, $3; Thos. Wentworth, $1; D. R. Lamson, $3; Mrs. M. D. Curtis, $3; Prof. A. E. Bland, $3; Oliver Gardner, $3; Rev. W. H. Savary, $2; L. L. Harwood, $3; Augustus Town, $3; James Humphrey, $2; David F. Child, $3; A. Waterman, $3; A. S. Brown, $3; John F. Smith, $1; Avery Lamb, 50 cts.; Terre Haute House, $2; C. A. Imberry, $1; B. Lindsey, $3; O. H. Daus, $3; Thos. H. Smith, $3; John S. Baldwin, $3; J. W. Scott, $3; Hon. Nath'l Holmes, $3; H. L. Daniels, $2; Miss C. G. Tallman, $3; F. J. Burnett, 50 cts.; Louis Kimmel, 50 cts.; Ida Baker, 50 cts.; J. G. Helmkamp, 50 cts.; D. Carstairs, 50 cts.; S. R. Campbell, $3; Hon. Samuel Campbell, $3; W. C. Little, $3; John S. Cox, $3; C. M. Fowler, $3; T. M. Lamb, $3; Mary C. Parker, $3; Marcen Wright, $1; Dr. M. Messing, $2; W. Hawes, $3; J. O. Martin, $3; N. C. Jase, $2; Geo. Maunfeld, $2; H. Bamberger, $1.50; H. Weinberger, $3.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

N. B.—THE INDEX is payable in advance. Its friends should not be offended if the paper is discontinued at the expiration of their term as indicated by the mail tags. We have no means of knowing whether they wish it continued or not except by the receipt or non-receipt of the subscription price.

N. B.—Please examine the ADDRESS and DATE on your INDEX mail-tag, and report at once any error in either.

N. B.—If your INDEX mail-tag is not changed within three weeks after renewing your subscription, please notify us immediately. But do not write before the expiration of that time.

N. B.—Postage on THE INDEX is five cents per quarter, dating from receipt of the first number, payable in advance at the place of delivery.

N. B.—In case of any error in your mail tag, always state the post-office at which the paper is received, and also the name just as it is now printed. Then state any desired correction.

N. B.—Please remit by post-office money-order, by registered letter, or by draft on New York. Cheques on interior banks are liable to discount, and the term of subscription will be proportionally shortened in the credit.

N. B.—When writing about a former remittance, always give the date of such remittance as exactly as possible.

RECEIVED.

TREATISE ON THE MANNER OF TESTING WATER-WHEELS AND MACHINERY. By JAMES KERRISON. Lowell, Mass: STORIS & HOWE, Printers. 1872.

THE MENTAL CURB, ILLUSTRATING THE INFLUENCE OF THE MIND ON THE BODY, etc. By Rev. W. F. EVANS, Author of "The Celestial Dawn," etc. Second Edition. Boston: WILLIAM WHITE & Co., 138 Washington St.

THE PROBLEM OF LIFE AND IMMORTALITY. An Inquiry into the Origin, Composition, and Destiny of Man. By LOUISA MOODY. Boston: WILLIAM WHITE & Co. 1874.

THE MANTERION, OR REASON AND RECOMPENSE. A Revelation concerning the Laws of Mind and Modern Mystical Phenomena. By MARCEUS R. K. WRIGHT, the Self Made Author & Seer. Chicago: RELIGIOUS PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE. 1872.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE FIFTH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, held in Boston, May 30 and 31, 1872. Boston: COCHRAN, Printer, 25 BRIMFIELD ST. 1872.

THE SCIENTIFIC ASPECT OF PRAYER. A Sermon by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, preached in Lyric Hall, September 22, 1872. New York: D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1872.

FOUR SERMONS Preached by the Rev. G. J. Wild, LL.D., at St. George's Hall, London, in the month of August. London: J. Low, 25 Currier St., Chancery Lane.

THE HERALD OF HEALTH for October. New York: WOOD & HOLBROOK, 15 & 15 LAIGHT ST. $2.00 a year.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE for October. Mrs. M. C. BLAND, editor. Chicago: 326 W. Madison St. $2.00 a year.

MONTHLY REPORT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE for August and September. 1872. Washington: GOVERNMENT PRINTING HOUSE.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000.

SHARES EACH $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE BEE, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 30, 1873. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock subscribed. The Directors are fully cognizant of this, and are scrupulously complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED elsewhere, Seven Hundred and Fifty

JOHN J. STEVENS, Oswego, N. Y., One Share			$75,000
C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, "	"	"	100
J. HENRY CLARKE, "	"	"	100
E. B. WALDO, "	"	"	100
G. N. STARRS, "	"	"	100
JOHN M. RICE, "	"	"	100
MARSHALL BROS., Minneapolis, Minn., "	"	"	100
S. LYDIARD, Long Lake, "	"	"	100
J. G. RICHARDSON, Lake City, "	Two	"	100
DR. D. K. BOUTELLE, "	One	"	200
R. E. GRIMSHAW, Minneapolis, Minn., "	"	"	100
MRS. E. CHORST, Portage City, Wis., "	"	"	100
WM. H. ELLERT, Burlington, Iowa, "	"	"	100
LYMAN T. OSBORN, Auburn, N. Y., "	"	"	100
P. C. TURNER, Albany, "	"	"	100
M. SCHLESINGER, "	"	"	100
JOSEPH KNIGHT, Troy, Ohio, "	"	"	100
L. S. BRYANT, Dayton, Ohio, "	"	"	100
L. P. GARDNER, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., "	"	"	100
J. C. CATTERTON, Rutherford Park, N. J., "	"	"	100
W. J. LEWIS, Illon, N. Y., "	"	"	100
HARVEY HAKES, "	"	"	100
THEO. BROWN, Worcester, Mass., "	"	"	100
C. W. ESTERBROOK, Boston, "	"	"	100
S. B. LONG, "	"	"	100
JURIN RIDGOUT, "	Five	"	500
A. FOLSON. (In trust) "	Three	"	300
JOHN WETTERBER, "	One	"	100
F. A. GREENE, "	"	"	100
E. S. DUNHAM, "	Two	"	200
C. CRIMMER, "	One	"	100
CHAS. T. HOW, "	Three	"	300
GEO. H. FOSTER, "	One	"	100
A. A. KNIGHT, "	"	"	100
GARDNER MURPHY, "	"	"	100
GEORGE HENSHAW, "	"	"	100
HENRY N. STONE, "	"	"	100
H. E. MANN, Fond du Lac, Wis., "	"	"	100
GODFREY GUNDERM, Ionia, Mich., "	"	"	100
F. H. HENSHAW, Boston, Mass., "	One	"	100
W. C. GANNETT, "	Two	"	200
MRS. K. G. WELLS, "	One	"	100
OSCAR ROOS, Taylor's Falls, Minn., "	"	"	100
F. D. ZIMMERMAN, Union City, Mich., "	"	"	100
PHILIP A. ZIMMERMAN, "	"	"	100
GEORGE HUBBARD, "	"	"	100
S. H. NYE, "	"	"	100
CHAS. H. SPRING, "	"	"	100
D. D. W. ROGERS, "	"	"	100
S. K. WINTINGTON, Clarendon, Pa., "	O.	"	100
JONATHAN WATSON, Titusville, "	"	"	100
MORRIS EIRSTEIN, "	"	"	100
MRS. " Ravenna, Ind., "	"	"	100
P. W. COOK, Evansville, Ind., "	Two	"	200
MRS. J. J. PILLBURY, "	One	"	100
MARY SHANNON, Newton, Mass., "	Four	"	400
MART C. SHANNON, "	One	"	100
R. L. BARR, Ft. Fairfield, Me., "	"	"	100
J. F. FRAZER, St. Louis, Mo., "	"	"	100
E. G. WINDBOGGER, "	"	"	100
D. R. SPARKS, Alton, Ill., "	"	"	100
WESLEY BEST, Litchfield, N. Y., "	"	"	100
D. THORNE, New York, N. Y., "	"	"	100
LEWIS G. JONES, "	"	"	100
M. B. BRANT, "	Two	"	200
JOHN W. CHADWICK, Brooklyn, "	One	"	100
E. S. DUNHAM, Boston, Mass., "	Two	"	200
ISAAC AMES, "	Three	"	300
CHAS. LEIVE, Richmond, Ind., "	One	"	100
GEO. C. DUNHAM, Dayton, Ohio, "	"	"	100

$34,900

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION:
CONDITIONAL STOCK LIST.

We, the undersigned, subscribers to the capital stock of the Index Association, agree to double our previous subscriptions to said stock on the same terms as before, taking respectively the additional number of shares set opposite to our names in the list below:

PROVIDED, That the full sum of One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000) shall have been subscribed in good faith by the twenty-sixth day of October, 1872,—that is, within one year from the date when THE INDEX passed into the hands of the Index Association.

ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin,	Pa.	Five	Shares,	$200
OSAS. A. GURLEY,	Pulaski,	N. Y.	One	"	200
MAX PRAGHT,	Cincinnati,	Ohio,	Two	"	200
J. N. LYMAN,	Columbus,	"	One	"	100
WALTER F. AUSTIN,	Pittsburgh,	Pa.	Two	"	200
JAB. R. STONE,	Cincinnati,	Ohio,	One	"	100
A. M. LOWLAND,	Boston,	Mass.	Five	"	500
J. C. ROONEY,	St. Louis,	Mo.	One	"	100
CHARLES POST,	Indianapolis,	Ind.	One	"	100
CLEMENS VONKREUT,	"	"	One	"	100
ALEX. METZGER,	"	"	One	"	100

22,400

SPECIAL NOTICE.—THE INDEX will be enlarged to sixteen pages at the commencement of its fourth volume, Jan. 1, 1873. After Sept. 28, 1872, the price of subscription will be $3.00 a year, in advance. But every subscriber, new or old, who remits $3.00 at once will be credited with a year's subscription from Jan. 1, and will meantime receive the paper free, if not already paid for.

It will gratify many of our readers to know that Mr. Stevens is a staunch friend of Mr. Greeley as a candidate for the Presidency. Inasmuch as several weeks ago we expressed our own intention of voting for General Grant, it is fair to say that in this, as in other matters, we do not presume to speak for Mr. Stevens. How far we agree or disagree must be gathered from his independent statements. It is the ground-plan of THE INDEX to respect to the uttermost the individuality of all those who speak through its columns.

The Index.

OCTOBER 19, 1872.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

BUSINESS NOTICE.—All communications without exception, on all matters pertaining to the paper, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, DRAWER 88, TOLEDO, OHIO." All cheques, drafts, and post office money orders, should be made payable to "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION." No responsibility is assumed for loss of money or neglect in the fulfilment of orders, unless these directions are STRICTLY COMPLIED WITH.

We solicit special attention to the above business notice.

TESTING PRAYER

Notwithstanding the flood of articles on prayer poured out every week in the religious press since the appearance of the Contemporary Review for July, much remains to be said touching the prayer-test proposed by Professor Tyndall. The subject is by no means exhausted, nor do we expect to exhaust it. But there are a few points that seem to have been strangely overlooked hitherto in the various treatments of the question that have fallen under our eye. We therefore solicit indulgence for a few more words concerning it.

In the first place, it is singularly conceived that Prof. Tyndall has challenged the Christian Church to a test of the efficacy of prayer. On the contrary, he has merely accepted a standing challenge, made to the world by Jesus, the apostles, the apostolic fathers, the Catholic, Greek, and Protestant clergy, and the entire body of professing Christians with the exception of a few rationalists who accept the name and reject the substance of Christianity. Nor only these. The Bible teaches the efficacy of prayer both in the Old and New Testaments; and in doing this it does but teach what almost all religious books and men have taught from the beginning. What has Professor Tyndall done but take them all at their word? He simply says in effect to the teachers and believers of Christianity:—

"You have declared, and still declare, that prayer for the recovery of the sick exerts a real and effective influence in curing their diseases; and for this reason you not only encourage such prayers, but urge it as a duty to offer them. Your litanies, read every Sunday in thousands of churches, contain special petitions for the sick; your ministers habitually pray for them, not only in the church, but in the sick-chamber; your church-members habitually rely on prayer as a means of rescuing their beloved ones from the natural consequences of disease. Your doctrine, if true, is of vast moment to the happiness of mankind: and I ask you to take such measures as shall give satisfactory evidence to serious minds either of the truth or the untruth of your doctrine. You challenge the world to believe in prayer as efficacious; it accepts your challenge, and will believe, if the assertion you make shall successfully meet the test of all rational belief in matters of fact; namely, the certified approval of competent observers. Will you submit to a fair, practical test of the doctrine you preach?"

In the second place, the Evangelical clergy unwittingly concede the justice of Professor Tyndall's demand for evidence by habitually offering evidence of their own selection. The difficulty is that, instead of submitting their doctrine to a fair test, they submit it only to sham ones. We said lately that the Christian world dares not submit to the test proposed. This is the reply of the New York Union Advocate:—

"Says the infidel organ of our country, 'You dare not meet the test proposed.' We acknowledge it, we dare not. We dare not come down from our vantage-ground of absolute faith to put God on probation. We dare not leave our position as redeemed sinners to take that of critical sceptics. We dare not lift our eyes to the mercy-seat in order to experiment on God's providence."

This is frank. Yet not wholly so, if this Evangelical paper consistently advocates the Evangical faith. That the demand for evidence, even with regard to the efficacy of prayer, is not considered unreasonable by the Evangelical community at large, is shown by the frequent allegation of remarkable cases of answer to prayer. No one who has ever read a report of the famous Fulton Street Prayer Meeting will fail to remember such cases; and how common it is to see the experience of George Müller with his Orphan House cited as a signal proof that prayer is still heard and answered in a wonderful manner! Yet of all conceivable proofs, this is the most lame and weak. Even the New York Independent, which clamorously denounced the unfairness of Professor Tyndall's test, in a subsequent issue unguardedly denounces the unfairness of this favorite test of its Evangelical brethren:

"The collections for Müller's Orphan House, Bristol, England, amounted during the year ending May 26th, 1872, to about $300,000; 'received,' it is alleged, in 'answer to prayer, without applying to individuals for help.' It is really time that this sort of talk should stop. Mr. Müller is doing a most excellent work, with economy and patience; but there is no more miracle about it than there is about the success of Mr. Bonner's Ledger. There is actually no charitable institution in the world that is advertised so thoroughly. This paragraph, with a thousand others in all the newspapers of Christendom, will help to make its merits known. We have no doubt that effectual prayer has much to do with the success of these orphan houses; but to ignore the legitimate human agencies constantly at work, and to pretend that the whole operation is supernatural, is a species of delusion in which we had better indulge sparingly."

So long as the Evangelical pulpit and press continue to urge this thoroughly exploded proof of the efficacy of prayer, they deceive themselves and the world by professing to rest their doctrine on "faith" alone. Even the Union Advocate, after the statement quoted above, immediately goes on to add what it considers and calls "proof" of God's answers to prayer; although this "proof" consists of such untrue statements as that "heathendom never erected an asylum for the sick, or crippled, or insane." Such cases simply show to every unprejudiced observer that the Evangelicals shrink from a fair test, only to rely on sham ones; that they feel the necessity of some sort of evidence, while they dread to seek evidence where alone it can be really found; that is, in painstaking and patient experiment. The Church promises proofs, and gives false ones; science asks for better, and is denounced as impious!

In the third place, it is said that Professor Tyndall's proposal is impracticable, because it invades the sphere of the affections and sentiments, which are incapable of statistical tabulation and mensurating processes; and that to experiment on God's love of his children for scientific purposes is to insult him and degrade ourselves. But this is to mistake the whole purpose of the proposition. The object is not to find out how much God loves his children, but simply whether prayers for the sick are actually followed by their convalescence. That such is the result, is taught by the Bible; that the fact, if real, is most important to our happiness, cannot be denied. It certainly is not trifling with God or man to endeavor to discover the truth in this matter. It may be, and doubtless would be, very bad to induce believers to comply with the necessary conditions of a satisfactory experiment. But it is no more an infringement of the sanctity of Divine love to ask whether prayer cures the sick, than it is to ask whether calomel or quinine cures them. If one experiment is blasphemous, insulting, or degrading, so is the other; for in either case God's laws of action are experimented with. No attempt is proposed to discover how much or how little love God has for man, but solely how it acts, and whether it responds to human entreaty with an inversion, suspension, or modification of physiological laws. In some form or other this experiment is sure to be made by every one who is doubtful on the point; the only question is, shall it be so made as to yield a trustworthy answer, or not? The world is full of doubters; why should not this question be put to the test of a careful and faithful experiment?

Thousands, it is true, disbelieve that a fair experiment would confirm the Christian faith in the efficacy of prayer; and in their company we belong. By all Scripture rules, this disbelief unites us for making the experiment ourselves,—as the boy found out who, being told by his minister that he could make a stone swim on the water if he only prayed believingly, threw in a stone and exclaimed, "O God, make it swim! And I believe it will!" but who, when it disappeared under the water, turned round and cried out, "There! I knew the old thing would sink!" Such lurking scepticism, of course, vitiates the experiment; and if unbelievers are ever to be convinced that prayer is efficacious, it must be by seeing its efficacy proved by the prayers of believers. Just so far, therefore, as professed believers really believe, and are anxious to convince the unbelieving, will they be eager to meet the test of a fair experiment. We repeat it,—the reluctance of the Christian world to test the Bible promise that "the prayer of faith shall cure the sick," is an irresistible proof that the Christian world has itself secretly lost faith in the truth of this promise. This result of Professor Tyndall's proposal cannot be set aside by any artifice, evasion, or clamor of obfuscation. Keen eyes watch the course of the Evangelical press in this matter, and detect the latent unbelief of the Church itself even in its most vehement professions of faith. "Art thou, too, become like unto one of us?"

In the last place, much confusion has arisen in this whole discussion from the double meaning of the word prayer. Etymologically it means petition, the request for some specific favor or boon; and this is undoubtedly the prevailing meaning of the word in common usage. But it also means worship, the effusion of devout sentiment and aspiration towards God. In all deeply earnest and elevated prayers, the latter element is at least as real as the former; and whenever we have listened to pulpit prayers which evidently came from the heart, it has predominated. We not only believe it possible that this element of worship may gradually supersede the other element of petition, but that it has actually done so in the case of multitudes of the most truly and highly religious natures of our own time. Prayer as petition has become obsolete to the noblest spiritual experience of the age; but prayer as worship, even if never expressed in public, nor even in words at all, is something which will certainly last as long as the belief in God. Against prayer in this high sense, nothing is said or implied by Professor Tyndall, nor by us in what precedes. It is only in the sense of petition that prayer can be tested; and when mankind are called upon by the Church to believe in the efficacy of such petition, the justice of the demand for real (or scientific) evidence is undeniable by any one who keeps in mind the above very essential distinction.

NONE TO SPEAK OF.

The human heart, regenerate or unregenerate, feels a certain respect for that worthy woman who, when asked about her religion, answered that she had "none to speak of." Yet what would become of prayer-meetings and revival meetings were this principle adopted? Inside of most churches, as it seems to me, there is a perpetual alternation between words of almost morbid self-depreciation, and utterances that seem like spiritual vanity.

The self-depreciation proceeds from those who are constantly declaring themselves "miserable sinners," when they do not honestly believe themselves to be so very bad, and in fact are not so. The other unhealthy extreme, of extravagant self-assertion, may be found in such phrases as these, which I have just read in the report of a Massachusetts camp-meeting. They are here given verbatim, withholding only the names.

"Rev. Mr. A. testified that religion was as sweet to him as honey in the comb.

"Rev. Mr. B. said that for the three hundred and sixty-five days of the past year Christ had dwelt in his heart. There was sung with much effect, 'All for Jesus,' upon which some one in the audience said, 'That's my situation.' 'Jesus has made my heart his home,' said another, 'and he abides there.'

"Rev. Mr. C. said, 'It is not yesterday, nor tomorrow with me, but I am saved now.'

"Rev. Mr. D. said there was no pride, hatred, malice, envy, or jealousy in his heart,—the blood of Christ cleansed him."

Suppose now that these worthy men had made these statements in a Free Religious convention, or in a Spiritualist convention, or in a scientific or political convention, what should we have thought of them? Would they awaken our reverence, or our suspicion? Would the most Evangelical merchant trust any man the better for assuring him that Christ had dwelt for three hundred and sixty-five days in his heart? Do we habitually believe a politician when he tells us there is no pride, hatred, malice, or jealousy in him?

I think not. It is probable that our inference would be just the other way. "Self-praise"—as I have no doubt the school-children who chatter at this moment beneath my window are saying—"goes but little ways." The jingle may sacrifice grammar, but it keeps good sense. For one, I distrust those circles and those spheres of life where it is necessary that a man should assume an attitude that comes so near what the world's people call conceit.

I have no doubt that there are many very good men in the Church, as out of it, though I am thoroughly convinced by a good many years of observation that there is less difference in this respect than is commonly supposed. I have no doubt that there were in that camp-meeting men of whom it could truly be said that they had no "pride, hatred, malice, envy, or jealousy" in their hearts. But I have serious doubts whether the Rev. Mr. D. was one of them—judging by his words. And I think that had Jesus Christ, the nominal master of these men, gone in among them, his first parable would have been, perhaps, that profoundly instructive one of the Pharisee and the Publican.

And, judging also from observation, I am afraid that, if any severe test were brought to bear upon these self-proclaiming revivalists,—such as the need of standing up against a slaveholding congregation, for instance, or a congregation of liquor dealers, or of dealing with an unpopular reform, like Woman Suffrage, or of resisting the blandishments of a rich gambler who can afford to endow a theological seminary for the sake of a whitewashed character,—they would be found no better able to stand the ordeal than a collection of the world's people who have "no religion to speak of." Genuine religion, in any high sense of the word, is the source of many noble deeds. But I utterly distrust the religion that proclaims its own perfect attainment in camp-meeting.

T. W. H.

PRAYER.

After a sermon on Tyndall's prayer-gauge,—in which it was contended that the proposed test could not be satisfactory for the reason that the universally recognized conditions of prayer removed the subject entirely from the reach of statistics, but in which at the same time the belief in answered prayer was challenged on the ground that an answering God was inconceivable to a mind familiar with the material organization of the universe, which is itself a complex arrangement of answers to every rational petition and of providing for every possible need,—a friend asked, "Why, then, do you pray?" I do not pray, was my reply. "Not pray? What, then, is the form you go through every Sunday morning in your religious service?" It is a form, I answered, of aspiration after divine things. I express as fervently as I can the human desire, craving, longing for spiritual qualities—for light, patience, peace, kindness, faith in the order and feeling for the sweetness of the world. But I ask for nothing; I hope for no gift; I dream of no unearned and unmerited blessing. "But is there not a suspicion of hypocrisy in going through the form of prayer when there is no faith in a response?" I do not go through the form of prayer, I rejoined; I go through the form of meditation and longing which is a very different thing, and a perfectly legitimate thing. And if I did go through the form of prayer, believing that what men call the answer is merely the result of the mind's action on itself, its readjustment to itself, so to speak, its restoration to a natural condition of repose, there would be no hypocrisy in it, nor deceit nor shadow of untruth; because the exercise is well understood and justly estimated as to its interior effects, and is performed without any ulterior purpose whatever, merely because it is natural, spontaneous, and delightful.

I do not know whether I made my friend comprehend what I meant. It amazed me to find one so intelligent blind to the plain, wide distinction between supplication and aspiration, between petition and longing. If he was blind to it, the number who perceive it must be small. It is the vulgar impression that the disbeliever in prayer has no faith in spiritual exercises. Nothing could be further from the truth. In fact the two things are scarcely related to each other. Prayer is not always a spiritual exercise; many of the prayers recorded in the Bible do not deserve so dignified a name; and spiritual exercise may never be prayer.

One of the Spectator's numerous correspondents thought he had settled the matter in favor of prayer, past all cavil, by relating the case of a friend who, travelling in Africa, I think, was discouraged and shaken in faith by the mutiny of his guides who refused to go with him further. In this emergency, he took advantage of a noon-day pause, to retire and pray with the utmost fervency for guidance and power. He rose from his knees refreshed and re-assured; with clear mind and resolute heart, he rejoined his companions, who acquiesced at once in his wishes and submissively obeyed his behest. What was this but a response to his prayer? Certainly; why not? Such experiences are familiar. Solitary communion with high thoughts, or even with one's own better nature, restores to the mental and moral powers their lost equilibrium, and exalts, sometimes to an astonishing degree, the personal magnetism of the will. Were no God believed in or thought of, the effect would be the same. No doubt the palpable conception of an individual Deity or a listening Christ assists the operation of steadying the faculties and stimulating the urgency of the feelings; but the ultimate result may be fully accounted for by the earnest concurrence of the individual will with universal principles, by the establishment of vital though but momentary relations between the solitary spirit and the quickening universe of order and law, by the passionate flight, as Plotinus calls it, "of the lonely to the Alone."

A perusal of Dorothea Trüdel's experience in Männedorf, in Switzerland, makes me suspect that the power by which she wrought the marvellous cures on the sick that made her name and her abode so famous, came to her by this process. Allowing for exaggeration and fanaticism, the truth of the stories respecting her well-known "prayer-cure" may be accepted without committing one to her faith or Dr. Tholuck's in the immediate efficacy of prayer. With her and with most of those who came to her for treatment, belief in such efficacy was an accepted point of faith. The prayer must be offered by a believer, and the efficacy was most marked on believers. She was a woman of morbid sensibilities, and, in consequence, of singular nervous influence. She "was once delirious for six hours from agonized feelings at not understanding the ways of God." "Miss Trüdel's whole influence was brought to bear on the soul; the healing of the body was a mere accidental circumstance. She declares to each patient, 'If you only believe, you may be healed by prayer.'" One point in her treatment throws an important light upon her method. We read that "she had Bible lessons which were attended by most of her patients, nor did she neglect proper discipline and firmness; so that, notwithstanding all the love she manifested to the mentally disordered, she never suffered their wills to rise in opposition to hers."

To argue the whole case presented by the narrative of Miss Trüdel's ministry, would require a longer essay than I should care to write or THE INDEX could afford to print. I merely allude to it here to prove that such narratives when fairly sifted contain nothing that need daunt the rationalist. The mind has resources enough in itself to explain all that requires special explanation in them.

It may be as well to add that with such as she the theist's argument drawn from the organized perfection of the universe for all contingencies has no force, for the "Christian world" is the only world they recognize. Christendom is the field of divine operation. The legitimate and only open commerce is between the Church and its Christ, not between man and his Maker. The impossibility of the latter is conceded by them. The finite mind cannot, we are repeatedly told, commune with the infinite. Prayer is a family arrangement by which a limited circle of people is permitted to solicit favors, and the head of the Church is empowered to grant them. Such an arrangement implies neither omnipotence nor omniscience; it compromises in no manner or degree the immutable laws of the world, nor does it interfere with the fixed economies of the planet. Christ aids his people as a friend aids his friends. If one can but believe that there is such a Christ, and that his Church sustains such a relation to him, the philosophical difficulty is reduced within a small compass. The question of prayer and its validity becomes one of Christology, not one of science. Men like Tyndall and Galton have nothing to do with it.

O. B. F.

"PRAYER" IN SOUTH PLACE CHAPEL.

LONDON, Sept. 24, 1872.

It is contrary to my habit and inclination to allow anything of even remote connection with myself to creep into my public correspondence; but perhaps I may safely regard the question raised by Mr. Towne concerning the usages of South Place Chapel to be of sufficient general interest to justify a few statements about them. The exercise which supersedes prayer at South Place is generally termed by the congregation a "Meditation." Its usual character is not specially represented by the beautiful sentences with which Mr. Ellis preceded his discourse on "The Dyer's Hand." For the Meditation is normally extemporaneous. It is an exhortation addressed to the congregation instead of to the Deity; or it is a call of the people to thankfulness; or it is an expression of devout joy in contemplation of the Supreme Reason as manifested within and without us. It is meant to be spontaneous, devotional, and real. It has no fixed place in any order of services: it may be the opening words, or—if not prompted by any inward suggestion—may be omitted altogether. It is our desire at South Place to avoid following any "Order of Services" so long as to wear it into a liturgical rut from which we cannot escape.

South Place Chapel was built, as most of your readers know, for the late W. J. Fox, who beginning as a Baptist preacher had become first a Unitarian, and next a Rationalist. It was sometime, however, after this chapel was built for him (that which he previously had being too small for the crowd which his eloquence attracted) before he reached the very pronounced stage of radicalism which he afterwards represented. And even more gradually than the old dogmas did the symbols which represented them fall away from his usages,—first the sacraments, and next the custom of prefixing texts to his discourses. Prayer of a certain diluted character remained, but with a careful avoidance of anything resembling a direct petition to the Deity. He might say, "May we be," but not "Give us" or "Help us." Such indeed was my own form of devotional expression when I began my work at South Place Chapel now nine years ago. But after a few years, with a cultivated and sympathetic society, I became impressed with the idea that we were not making the most of the devotional feature of our service. The form of it—whatever new wine I might try to put into it—seemed to me plainly an old skin. Would our perfect faith in God, in his sure wisdom and love, ever have naturally shaped itself into the form of supplication (however refined), had that form not been hereditary? The form of petition implies that the one petitioned requires some notification of the thing wanted. The form of praise implies that the being praised might have done something evil. There is a satire in thanking a judge for his decision. Moreover, while for those who invented the plan of offering laudations to God, evidently believing that the compliments would soothe and please him, there was a genuineness in this form, is it not rather patronising in us who believe that the perfect law is forever executed without the slightest reference to our approbation or our disapprobation?

But even beyond this there seemed to me this fundamental objection to all forms of direct address to the Deity: it presumes a definiteness of knowledge about the Deity which no man has. Has he ears? Is it his way to attend to what A and B are saying? Is he fond of hearing himself praised, or, at least, having his attributes repeated over to him? Prayer may not mean that to Samuel Johnson or to Mr. Towne; but what shape does the form of ascription take in minds less trained to escape the implications of language?

There is a very obvious and common recourse amid difficulties like these. We know many people who take all the philosophy of the nineteenth century and label it Christianity, that they may still claim the prestige of being Christians. And there are similar inducements to take exercises meant to influence our own minds and call them prayer. But this tampering with words is dangerous. Prayer means an entreaty offered to some person for a favor. It cannot be twisted into any other honest meaning. If we do not mean the thing, let us not use the word; otherwise we will bear a false testimony. No exercise which aims only to affect our own state of mind can be truly called a prayer. If our thankfulness be addressed to the Deity, it becomes an affectation so soon as it passes beyond the distinct form of an apostrophe. Some highly poetical minds may indulge in this view; but I fear it is at the cost of confirming low conceptions of the Deity in the minds of the prosaic.

But I will not pursue these arguments, especially as I am not prepared to devote my letters in THE INDEX to a defence of my own theology. I will only add that the weight which, I believe, has finally determined us at South Place to give up any semblance of Prayer is that it is felt to be a waste of opportunity. It would be an attempt to cultivate our acre with a mediæval plough. It was the natural expression of another age with other ideas, and what to them was a real face would be a mere mask to us; it would impede our full voice and expression. We are just able to wrest, amid the turmoil and care of life, some hour and a half every week to give to that subject which alone holds our life out of the mire. Shall we devote any moment of the golden hour to fruitless petitions to God or to pious indirections? South Place is now near completing a half-century of its existence, and it may perhaps be pardoned for feeling that it has accumulated some store of experience. Holding together in unity, with a singular individuality—so that there sit in it to-day as gray-haired men and women many of those who helped to lay its corner stone—it has passed through many phases of unlearning and learning. That Prayer has ceased in it is far more attributable to the moral and intellectual atmosphere of the Society which revealed its anomalous character, than to any discovery of my own. It is among the things we have tried and found wanting, because quite inadequate to serve us in our united effort to attain a religion that shall in every detail accord with the reality of Nature.

M. D. C.

"The Protestant Christian religion in the West has fallen upon its great day of trial. The Pope is in its front and the devil in its rear, and a cloud of neutrals is hovering upon its flanks. I have watched this thing fifteen years, and I have come to this conclusion,—that the fate of this Western America depends on the triumph of a progressive Christianity of the Protestant form; and if that result does not peacefully come, that another generation will behold us plunged in a social war as far transcending the religious wars of Europe as our political revolution surpassed any rebellion of modern times. You may think me vastly illiberal or absurdly fanatical for this opinion, but I cannot help it." This vigorous Jeremiah by Rev. A. D. Mayo, lately of Cincinnati, recognizes a fact to which many are blind; namely, that Protestant Christianity "has fallen upon its great day of trial." This fact is not peculiar to the West, but characterizes the age. That any such lame conclusion, however, as that of the "triumph of a progressive Christianity of the Protestant form" should be drawn from the premises, shows that Mr. Mayo has not yet studied the subject thoroughly. Either Catholicism or Free Religion will ultimately "triumph," and Protestantism in all its forms will be ground to powder between them. A social war may or may not be the necessary antecedent of the future homogeneity of modern civilization; but in any event it is fatuous to expect that Protestantism, which can never be at peace with itself, will be able to give peace to the world. There is no universal and permanent peace but in universal and permanent freedom; and Christianity has not this to give.

EDITORIAL BOOK NOTICES.

THE PILGRIM'S HARP, by Asa Hull, is one of the collections of so-called "sacred" music issued by Oliver Ditson & Co., 277 Washington Street, Boston. It is small, but contains about two hundred and fifty tunes and hymns; and it is designed chiefly for social and family use.

PANSIES—"FOR THOUGHTS," published by James R. Osgood & Co., Boston, is a little volume of poems by Mrs. Adeline D. T. Whitney. Some of them are graceful and pleasing, as for instance those entitled "Larve," "Behind the Mask," "The Three Lights," "Sparrows," and so forth. The title is strained, and not quite to our taste; but there is a tone of tenderness and purity in the book which will make many friends for it.

HEBREW MEN AND TIMES, FROM THE PATRIARCHS TO THE MESSIAH, by Rev. Joseph Henry Allen. Second edition, with an Introduction. Boston: Horace B. Fuller, 14 Bromfield Street. 1872. The valuable Introduction, giving a sketch of the three great theories of Esau, Colenso, and Bunsen, concerning the early history of the Hebrew people, is of great interest; and we hope to find more for it in these columns entire, when, by the enlargement of THE INDEX, we shall have more space at command for such purposes. The various chapters of the book treat successively of the Patriarchs, Moses, the Judges, David, Solomon, the Kings, the Law, the Prophets, the Captivity, the Maccabees, the Alexandrians, the Messianic; and an appendix gives a "Chronological Outline of the Later Monarchy," with Ewald's dates. Mr. Allen, who was formerly editor of the Christian Examiner (now discontinued), is a gentleman of ripe and accurate scholarship, whose work is always entitled to the highest respect; and whoever wishes to form a clear conception of Hebrew history in brief, not as recounted in the legends and mythical traditions of the Bible, but as condensed from the voluminous and expensive works of the best Biblical scholars, will be as much pleased as instructed with this excellent volume. The standpoint of the writer is that of the most liberal Unitarianism; and although we cannot feel entirely satisfied with his chapter on the Messiah, we take great pleasure in recommending his work as a whole to our readers, as the best popular summary of the subject within the range of our knowledge.

A MANUAL OF THE ANATOMY OF VERTEBRATED ANIMALS, by Professor Huxley. D. Appleton & Co. 1872. This admirable and richly illustrated work by no means belongs to the category of treatises on what is usually called "popular science," as might be expected by those who know Professor Huxley only by his brilliant Lay Sermons, or even by those who have read in addition his Man's Place in Nature and Origin of Species. It rather belongs with such books as aim to set forth in compendious and systematic form the general principles and facts of a special science, like his invaluable little Lessons in Elementary Physiology. Condensed manuals of this character, giving in well-arranged form the results of the latest and most thorough research, must be of great value even to the special student; but to readers of merely general culture, who desire not to be wholly ignorant of modern science and its rapid progress, yet have no time to master such formidable treatises as Professor Owen's Anatomy of Vertebrates, their value cannot be overrated. Comparative anatomy is not, of course, a subject in which much originality is to be expected: it is the product of the conjoint labors of many great investigators, and has its well established principles. Professor Huxley, however, is far more than a mere compiler, being one of the few whose independent inquiries have enlarged the bounds of science; and on points where he diverges from his most eminent collaborators, as for instance with regard to the true classification of the Mammalia, which he bases on placental rather than on cerebral characteristics, his opinions are entitled to all the weight which attaches to original and thorough investigation. The present work gives a general view of the organization, classification, and embryology of the Vertebrata, which Huxley divides into three great provinces, namely, the Ichthyopterygia, the Sauropsida, and the Mammalia; whereas the long accepted division of Cuvier was into four great groups, fishes, reptiles, birds, and mammals. The Ichthyopterygia embrace two classes, fishes and amphibians; the Sauropsida embrace two classes, reptiles and birds; the Mammalia embrace three principal groups. We notice that Professor Nicholson, in his recent manual of Zoology, follows Huxley's classification. Of the numerous and well-executed illustrations, about two-thirds are Huxley's own, the rest being copied from Agassiz, Bischoff, and others. A full index accompanies the text, but the book would have been at least doubled in usefulness to instructors, as well as to private students, by the addition of a good glossary of technical terms. Price, $2.50.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.
N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

THE AMERICAN SPLINTERS.

BY REV. EDWARD C. TOWNE.

The organization known as "The American Board" is in splinters, which will not much longer hold together. Sixteen years ago, at Newark, N. J., I saw this organization through all the sessions of an annual meeting. I was then Orthodox, and had not yet thought of being otherwise; but this meeting convinced me that nobody to speak of among the Orthodox really believed the world lost. I had for years expected with myself to go to South Africa as a missionary, under this very Board; but when I saw and heard them, and witnessed the ado they made to get a little money, I cut loose from them as not believing what they pretended to believe. No doubt had ever entered my mind as to the truth of the Orthodox creed; but here I could not but see that unconsciously all these people had found an easy way out of that creed, and had no thought of taking hold as if to save a lost world. People who had money evidently intended to keep it, and evidently had no fear that God would damn the heathen,—and other people were equally easy about "a lost world." They plainly did not believe a word of it. Else they would have poured out like water their money, their labors, their very lives, as more than a million offered these to our country when civil war broke out.

In the meeting of the Board just held in New Haven, this break-up of faith has been still more apparent. The complaint is openly made that men cannot be got for the mission work. "Out of the seven theological seminaries to which the American Board has a right to look for recruits," said a missionary in one of the meetings here, "after a most thorough examination of the graduating classes, how many had come forward? Only Three."

At the great closing meeting of Friday morning, when leave was taken of the missionaries going out, or going back, I watched for some sign that somebody thought of the world as lost, and I could not see one. Not one word, either of prayers, hymns, or addresses, directly recognized that there is any such thing as a lost world. Two or three indirect allusions to saving souls implied the old doctrine, but not one word fell from anybody which directly contemplated this. It was all for Jesus and for self, chiefly the latter. Thus a returned missionary from Zululand held up the matter in this light, that all the souls they saved would be part of their reward in heaven. He professed to hear the voices of his converts calling him back, but he said nothing of the appeal of lost souls. So it was with every speaker, every prayer, and every hymn. Not even by accident did anybody remember the lost. The inference is a fair one that belief that there are any totally lost is played out, as they say in the West.

I know that the daughter of the most distinguished New England clergyman characterized the gathering of the Board here as "a religious spree." I know that one of the best known younger Orthodox ministers of New England said of his own presence here that he "had come to see the fun." And as I have seen the crowd on the streets, seven women taking hold of one man in many instances, I have seen many signs of a spree, and none at all of a solemn rescue of the lost. What a horde can be drawn together by half-fare and three days' free lunch and free lodgings! Victuals seems to be the principal thing with very many; with all their getting they get free victuals, and rejoice with exceeding joy. Such feasting of a mob of silly women! Cut off the picnic features of the affair, and its show of strength would be gone. But, of course, take all the meetings through, and a show is made of running a salvation mill. The hard point seems to be to get the Lord to do his part. For some reason the Lord hangs back, like a lazy horse in a tread-mill, and loud cries echo from all sides to have everybody pray the Lord to keep the ball moving. A highly cultivated gentleman said to me: "It seemed as if they belonged to some heathen religion; I couldn't imagine this sort of thing going on in a Christian country." And another person who went in to listen said that one couldn't help thinking whether some other religion were not better than the Christian so understood. And this the President of the Board, Dr. Hopkins, distinctly came to when he said that, if reports were true, as he supposed they were, about the ability and behavior of Japanese students, he wished they would send them to all of our colleges to serve as models. It is a fact that the Japanese youth sent here are decidedly superior to the average of Christians, in both character and manners, and might better set up as missionaries to us than we as redeemers to them. The world is better than the old Orthodox fables and falsities have made it. It is ridiculous for a Board to offer itself as a plan of salvation. There happens to be a Power that shapes our ends, and the ends of the race, and we only need to work modestly and humbly anywhere to be part of the one plan which holds the universe.

DO JUSTICE TO GOD.

BY CHARLES K. WHITTLE.

The popular impression that, if one's life is right, his belief is of no consequence is a very great error. Since our life is a series of actions very largely regulated by our belief, a right belief is of great consequence; and since our feelings of reverence and love towards God have a close relation to our belief respecting him, and thus a practical bearing upon our obedience to his will, it is of great importance that we rightly understand God's relation to us, and the parts of his character which affect that relation.

Everybody agrees that we ought to love God. Everybody agrees also that he is worthy to be loved. Yet, even while sincerely holding this faith, the popular belief, directed by the popular clerical teaching, ascribes to God acts which, if done by men, would be everywhere recognized as unjust and evil.

It was God without doubt, who put into the hearts of fathers love for their children,—prompting all sorts of benefit and dissuading from all sorts of injury to those children. We call this feeling natural affection; we find it one of the strongest motives which influence human beings; we assume that God made this parental feeling, and designed it to be one of the chief springs of human action; and we honor and venerate him for it, recognizing in this a new evidence of the truth that "God is love."

Now when we read that Gessler commanded William Tell to do something which seriously risked the killing of his own son by his own hand, we immediately feel that this command was barbarous as well as unjust. It was at once a tyrannical action and a cruel action. We instinctively feel that so atrocious a command proceeds from a bad heart. When we look at the reason of the command, and find that it was designed as a test of the obedience of the subject to the ruler, a trial to see whether the sovereign's order would induce a good man to do a thing cruel as well as wicked, we find that this reason aggravates the guilt of the sovereign in question; and if any one should seriously declare Gessler a good ruler, and justified in giving such a command by the fact of his sovereignty, we should think such a person either wicked or crazy.

But the popular theology ascribes to God the very same act which we reprobate in Gessler, committed for the very same reason which we hold to be an aggravation of Gessler's tyranny. The clergy tell us that God commanded Abraham deliberately to kill his own son, choosing for that sacrifice the son he most tenderly loved, doing so expressly to try whether even cruelty like this would be committed at his bidding, and ultimately praising and rewarding Abraham for consenting to commit it!

Why do the clergy attribute such a desire, such a purpose, and such a command, to that same God who is the author of parental affection, and whom they call "good," and for whom they claim our veneration because he is good? How can they suppose that the Creator ever thus contradicted himself, requiring by a special command that which he had most emphatically forbidden by the very constitution of the being who was commanded? How can they admit that God, the perfection of love and goodness, and the prescriber of love and goodness as the invariable duty of men, has ever required of one of his creatures a violation of love and goodness as an act of obedience to him, and for the very purpose of testing the spirit of obedience?

For the enormous absurdity of this clerical imputation of self-contradiction and wrong-doing to God himself, there is only one reason; a reason so inadequate as to amaze any one who candidly examines it.

The belief that God really commanded a father to kill his own son is required for the maintenance of a church theory that all the writings composing the Old and New Testaments are absolutely free from error, whether of fact or doctrine; the church theory that God himself dictated the contents of these sixty-six books to the forty or fifty men who wrote them in different centuries, different countries, and different languages.

What there is so precious in this church theory as to require, for its sake, to charge God himself with self-contradiction and wrong-doing, is a mystery. The doctrine in question is repugnant not less to true faith than to sound reason. Faith surely requires us to think well of God; to believe in his invariable goodness; to assume the rectitude of his means as well as of his ends; and to discredit all priestly theories which impute to him unworthiness either in thought or action. When the Hindu scriptures declare God to have done an evil act or commanded some man to do it, we do not for a moment credit the foolish story, nor are we moved to credit it by the united assertion of the Brahmans that it must be believed. We see it to be infinitely more probable that the unknown writer of the narrative misapprehended God, than that God himself should either be evil or do evil. Why should not sound reason and true faith be equally followed in the case of the Hebrew scriptures? Why should our idea of God be lowered to maintain the credit of the unknown author of Genesis? Why should we uphold, at God's expense, and at the expense of sound reason and true faith, the church theory that the writing of that book was supernaturally instead of naturally accomplished?

If we suppose that the unnamed Hebrews who wrote the documents which were ultimately collected to form the book of Genesis gave us their own ideas, or the ideas current in their time, about the character and works of God, and the ways whereby he manifested himself to men, this book will plainly appear to be (as indeed it is) one of the most valuable of human histories; just such a record as we should desire to have of the beginnings of any religion or of any community; a tide-mark enabling us to judge of the progress of intelligence, of sound reason, and true faith since that time. Of course, since God is always teaching his human children, always present with them to instruct inquiring minds and souls, and since the means for a wide diffusion of knowledge, spiritual as well as physical, are increasing with every century, of course we now know more about God, and his true relation to men, and his requisitions of them, than the people of three thousand years ago; and no sufficient reason, no plausible reason, even, can be given why our ideas of those matters should be held in subjection to the ideas of uncivilized ages. Justice to God requires that we think well of him; and true reverence demands our rejection of all those speculations of former times which impute to him either deficiency or unworthiness.

FRANCIS KERNAN.

NEW YORK, Oct. 4, 1872.

MR. EDITOR:—

An extract in your paper states that "the defeat of Francis Kernan for Governor, which is as sure to come as the day of election, will be due to this determination of the people that Catholic influence shall not predominate anywhere in the State."

Now hear another side. The Catholic influence has predominated up to this date in this city and State, so much at least as to obtain for the schools and charities managed by it more of the public funds than all other sects together. In order to put a stop to all sectarian appropriations and to all perversion of the public funds to sectarian uses in our common schools or elsewhere, the good people of this State have determined that, so sure as Hon. Francis Kernan lives on the day of election, they will elect him Governor of this State for these reasons:—

1. They know that he will be less of a sectarian than any man who ever filled the chair, knowing as they do that, as a member of our late Constitutional Convention, he was the ablest and most earnest advocate of a provision in the proposed constitution absolutely forbidding any sectarian appropriations to any sect whatever; and knowing, as the intelligent of them do, that he has been a lifelong advocate of our common schools, and that all of his numerous family of children were educated in those schools.

2. A large majority of the free thinkers of this State, including a large majority of your readers, are also Liberals in politics, and will show their magnanimity on election day by coming forward, Abolitionists and Infidels as many were, and casting aside dead issues to vote for that lifelong Catholic and Democrat, the noble gentleman and honest citizen, Francis Kernan.

Yours truly,

A. G. S.

[The "extract" alluded to made only an incidental reference to Mr. Kernan, its main point being to expose the cunning evasion of the State Superintendent's decision by the Board of Education at Hunter's Point. Not suspecting that any one's sensitiveness would be touched by so casual a mention, we forbore to expurgate the admirable article in question; and we now do penance for our fault by inserting the above out of regard for fair play.—ED.]

Disasters like those of the Metis bring out by a sudden intense test the quality that is at the bottom of men. The courage or cowardice, the nobleness or the selfishness, that is partly hidden by the petty course of ordinary life, flashes out in such moments of supreme trial. Yet those who fail are not to be hardly judged; many may fall under the unexpected, terrible pressure, who, had they time to adjust themselves to circumstances, would prove essentially heroic. But we know nothing grander than what is implied in such a sentence as this: "One young man voluntarily surrendered a piece of debris to which he was clinging, to a mother and babe, and after letting go his hold disappeared, never to rise again."—Chr. Union.

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PARAPHRASES FROM THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—Ten Cents (New Edition.)

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. PROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents concepts of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no able, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution!" Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. PROTHINGHAM, is a singularly felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, contains in full the Call for the Cincinnati Convention of the "National Reform Association," which proposes to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution,—the list of its most prominent supporters,—and a full exposure of the dangerous and revolutionary character of the movement. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

Also, "The Bible Argument Against Woman Suffrage," a pungent pamphlet by A. J. GROVER, is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; twelve copies One Dollar.

Address, THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1872, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA;" by C. D. B. Mills, on the question, "Does RELIGION REPRESENT A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A PERISHABLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. B. Prothingham, on "THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY;" together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucetta Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Stearns, Alexander Loom, and others. Price, 35 cents; in packages of five or more, 25 cents each.

The ANNUAL REPORTS for 1869, 1869, 1870, and 1871 (at 25 cents each), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), Rev. W. H. Channing's essay on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA" (30 cents), Col. T. W. Higginson's essay on "THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS" (30 cents), and an essay by W. J. Potter, on "REASON AND REVELATION" (10 cents)—all published through the Association—can also be obtained as above.

[144-1] Secretary.

DAVID G. FRANCIS.

DEALER IN

NEW AND OLD BOOKS,

17 Astor Place, and 140 8th St., New York.

Priced catalogues of books in stock, loaned from time to time, will be forwarded free to any address.

[1471]

Back Numbers of the Index!

FOR 1870 AND 1871.

IT is no longer possible to furnish a complete file of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address at

Twenty-five Cents a Dozen!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

Address THE INDEX,
Toledo, Ohio.

35 to $20 per doz. Agents wanted! All persons on working paper who for value of the paper amount of all the time that a single copy can be had for. Address G. B. Francis & Co., Portland, Maine.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

Capital, $100,000.

Shares, $100.

OFFICERS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, President.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Vice President.
P. H. BATESON, Secretary.
A. E. MACOMBER, Treasurer.

DIRECTORS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
ASA K. BUTTS, New York, N. Y.
RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Toledo, O.
A. E. MACOMBER, " "
CALVIN CONE, " "
EDWARD BISSELL, " "
P. H. BATESON, " "

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo, O.,	Twenty Shares,	$3,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	" "	Fifteen "	1,500
C. CONE,	" "	" "	1,500
EDWARD BISSELL,	" "	Forty "	4,000
F. E. ABBOT,	" "	Ten "	1,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	" "	" "	1,000
GUIDO MARK,	" "	" "	1,000
P. H. BATESON,	" "	" "	1,000
E. P. BARRETT,	" "	" "	1,000
H. E. HOWE,	" "	Three "	300
W. C. FINE,	" "	" "	300
J. M. RICHIE,	" "	" "	300
Y. KERN,	" "	" "	300
ALANSON WOOD,	" "	" "	300
WILLIAM KRAUS,	" "	Five "	500
J. G. HOLEWARTH,	" "	One "	100
JOS. E. MARK,	" "	" "	100
C. ACHARD,	" "	" "	100
ASA K. BUTTS,	New York, N. Y.,	Thirty "	3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Newport, R. I.,	Two "	200
ALICE COCHRAN,	Franklin, Pa.,	Five "	500
Geo. Hoadly,	Cincinnati, O.,	Two "	200
Miss A. Hall,	Danvers, Mass.,	One "	100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Northampton, Mass.,	" "	100
J. SEDGWICK,	Tonica, Ill.,	" "	100
CARL POST,	Palmsville, O.,	" "	100
HENRY MILLER,	Mourne, Mich.,	Three "	300
L. R. SUNDHILL,	Sacramento, Cal.,	Five "	500
J. L. WATSON,	Quincy, Mass.,	One "	100
LOUIS BRISTOL,	Boston, Mass.,	" "	100
J. E. SUTTON,	Croydon, N. H.,	" "	100
SAM T. DUNN,	Olathe, Kan.,	" "	100
J. M. HADLEY,	" "	" "	100
S. L. HILL,	Florence, Mass.,	Ten "	1,000
W. H. SPENCER,	Haverhill, Mass.,	Two "	200
JON. F. BARRETT,	Boston, Mass.,	" "	100
E. W. WALK,	La Grange, Ind.,	" "	300
FRANK PRATER,	Boston, Mass.,	Five "	500
E. F. DINGMORE,	Wellsville, Kan.,	One "	100
J. T. DICKINSON,	New York, N. Y.,	Two "	200
W. J. POTTER,	Middlefield, Ct.,	Fourteen "	1,400
G. C. GLATTE,	New Bedford, Mass.,	Three "	300
W. C. GARNETT,	Kendallville, Ind.,	" "	100
Miss M. C. PERKINS,	Boston, Mass.,	One "	100
Mrs. S. EMERSON,	Dover, N. H.,	" "	100
Miss E. EMERSON,	" "	" "	100
W. H. DOWNER,	Birmingham, Ct.,	" "	100
B. B. SMITH,	Lansing, Mich.,	" "	100
R. B. SMITH,	Warren, Pa.,	" "	100
W. C. RUSSELL,	Ithaca, N. Y.,	" "	100
W. CLARK,	Toledo, O.,	Three "	300
C. L. SMITH,	" "	Twenty "	2,000
J. N. LYMAN,	Cincinnati, O.,	One "	100
L. G. FRIEL,	Monroe Centre, Mass.,	Three "	300
A. FOLSON,	Boston, Conn.,	One "	100
S. E. SEWALL,	Colebrook, Conn.,	Five "	500
ELIZABETH WOODHUT,	Boston, Mass.,	" "	100
E. B. WARD,	Detroit, Mich.,	Twenty "	2,000
A. D. WILT,	Dayton, O.,	One "	100
S. S. BOKER,	Keokuk, Iowa,	" "	100
WM. JONES,	Peekskill, N. Y.,	" "	100
B. H. DANE,	Oskaloosa, Iowa,	" "	100
J. H. YORK,	Dover, N. H.,	" "	100
JOS. HAYES,	" "	" "	100
G. P. FOLSON,	" "	" "	100
"A FRIEND,"	" "	" "	100
Mrs. H. E. PERKINS,	" "	Two "	200
O—	Boston, Mass.,	One "	100
WILLIAM GREEN,	Orange, N. J.,	" "	100
"A FRIEND,"	Lowell, Mass.,	" "	100
D. B. STEINMAN,	Brattleboro, Vt.,	" "	100
W. F. W. CHRISTIAN,	New York, N. Y.,	" "	100
C. W. FAVORITE,	Kelly's Island, O.,	" "	100
EDW. M. DAVIS,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	Two "	200
Mrs. LUCRETIA MOTT,	" "	One "	100
Miss M. A. WILSON,	Jersey City, N. J.,	" "	100
A. S. BROWN,	Worcester, Mass.,	" "	100
EDWIN BROWN,	" "	" "	100
E. F. HOLLOWELL,	Boston, Mass.,	Five "	500
BENJ. RODMAN,	New Bedford, Mass.,	Three "	300
B. B. CLARK,	" "	" "	100
FRANK J. SCOTT,	Toledo, O.,	Six "	600
M. L. HOLBROOK,	Houlton, Me.,	One "	100
W. H. BOUGHTON,	New York, N. Y.,	" "	100
HENRY H. RICHARDSON,	" "	" "	100
E. G. BURNETT,	Webster, Mass.,	Two "	200
J. E. FOLLETT,	Winona, Minn.,	One "	100
JON. WARRABER,	Newton, N. J.,	" "	100
T. M. LAMB,	Franklin, Pa.,	" "	100
W. H. DYRE,	Worcester, Mass.,	" "	100
W. H. SPALDING,	Palme du Chien, Wis.,	" "	100
LEWIS BELLON,	Duluth, Minn.,	" "	100
LOUIS KURTZ,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	Two "	200
SAM'L WARRABER,	Augusta, Kan.,	One "	100
W. L. RATHER,	La Fayette, N. J.,	" "	100
W. EMERSON,	Amesbury, Mass.,	" "	100
C. H. HORCH,	Boston, Mass.,	" "	100
Miss I. THOMSON,	Dover, N. H.,	Two "	200
BENJ. HOLLOWELL,	Sandy Spring, Md.,	One "	100
Mrs. M. R. VAN HENCKELAER,	N. Y. City,	" "	100
R. B. STONE,	Watson, Penn.,	" "	100
WM. ROTON,	Fall River, Mass.,	Two "	200
Mrs. J. WHITAKER,	New Bedford, Mass.,	Five "	500
S. H. ROPER,	Kerhonkson, N. Y.,	One "	100
Mrs. R. D. FRANCIS,	Boston Highlands, Mass.,	Two "	200
CHAS. BONNELL,	New York, N. Y.,	" "	100
G. H. BRIGGS,	Salem, O.,	" "	100
J. T. CLARKSON,	Amesbury, Mass.,	Two "	200
C. W. NEWTON,	Castleton, Ill.,	One "	100
HENRY KIERST,	Toledo, O.,	Two "	200
OTTO KLEIN,	" "	One "	100
H. G. NEUBERT,	" "	Two "	200
A. BUNKER,	" "	One "	100
TOLEDO PRINTING Co.,	Detroit, Mich.,	Thirty "	3,000
T. K. PECK,	Toledo, O.,	Thirty "	3,000
	Westminster, Ct.,	Two "	200

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 142 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and in Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM V. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. PROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Weston super Mare, Eng.
Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.

ASA K. BUTTS is Advertising and General Agent for the Index Association. All letters to him on business matters should be addressed—"THE INDEX, Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio."

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.
Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription. Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months in trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

New Tracts!

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition.

FIRST SERIES.....No. 1 to No. 30

SECOND SERIES.....No. 31 to No. 60

Either Series, 30 Cents; Both, 50 Cents.

Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,
[32-33] 19 PINE STREET, BOSTON.

GIVEN AWAY

TO ANY BOOK AGENT,

A $5.00 GREENBACK

AND A SPECIMEN OF THE

GREAT INDUSTRIES

OF THE UNITED STATES.

1300 PAGES AND 500 ENGRAVINGS.

PRINTED IN ENGLISH AND GERMAN.

Written by 30 Eminent Authors, including Horace Greeley and John B. Gough.

We want Agents in every town to solicit orders for this work, on liberal terms. It sells to all classes, and no library should be without it. It is a complete history of all branches of industry, processes of manufactures, etc. No like work ever before published. One agent sold 158 in eight days, another 238 in two weeks. An early application will secure a choice in territory. Full particulars and terms will be sent free, with a specimen of this Great Work, and a $5 Greenback.

[126-151.] J. B. BURR & HYDE, Hartford, Conn.

HALL'S

MAGIC SHADE FIXTURES!

An ingenious arrangement by which a Shade may be rolled down from the top, or raised from the bottom of the Window, or both, as may be desired; thus securing PERFECT VENTILATION, GOOD LIGHT, and at the same time COMPLETE PROTECTION to the room.

They are an admirable and cheap substitute for Inside Blinds.

Are easily attached to Shades now in use. Are especially adapted for Office and Store Windows.

For sale by dealers in shades generally.

MANUFACTURED BY THE

CHICAGO CURTAIN FIXTURE COMPANY,

101 WEST LAKE ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

[1371]

F. J. SCOTT, J. H. STOPPLET.

ARCHITECTS,

73 MADISON STREET (Near Body House), TOLEDO.
[180-181]

Guns for the People.

Breech-Loading Double Guns, $40 to $500. Double-Barrel Shot-Guns, $5 to $150. Single Guns, $3 to $20. Breech-loading and Repeating Rifles, $20 to $100. Revolvers $4 to $25. Pistols, 75c. to $5. SEND STAMP FOR PRICE-LIST TO GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, P. O. Box 1079, Pittsburgh, Pa.

N. B.—Army Guns, Revolvers, etc., bought or traded for.

[187-187ew]

FOR ENGLISH AND AMERICAN BOOKS of all kinds, send to J. F. RUGGLES, Bronson, Mich. [187ew1]

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, OCTOBER 26, 1872.

WHOLE No. 148.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
ABRAHAM WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WESTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLGREN, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHERRY, ROY. CHARLES VOSSET (England), PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), ROY. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

The Most Important Belief.

BY A. W. STEVENS.

At one time a certain question greatly exercised my mind, to the exclusion well nigh of every other. It was this: What is the most important and vital belief that one can have? After the carefulest and maturest reflection which I was able to give to the question, the following was the answer which seemed to me truest and best to make to it:—

The most important and vital belief one can have is a belief in Goodness for its own sake.

The time was, I confess, when I might have rendered a different answer. I am quite sure that once I should have said that the most important and vital belief a man could have was a belief in God. And, for my own part, I still cherish and rejoice in such a belief. All the experience of my life has but tended to confirm me in it; and though I have no absolute demonstration to offer that God is, and believe that as yet no man has, my intellect and my heart both cry out for an Infinite Being of infinite intelligence and love, and I am somehow filled with a sublime confidence that such a Being does exist and rule.

And yet it is my present conviction that belief in Goodness is more important than belief even in God. And I have in part been led to this conviction by observing the effect which each of these beliefs has upon those who hold it, and upon mankind in general. I observe that vast numbers of men believe in God without being any better for it. The Bible says "the devils believe and tremble;" that is, they believe in God, —in his power, majesty, and greatness,—and yet they are devils still. But suppose there were such a being as a devil, and suppose he could be brought to believe in goodness for goodness' sake, —he would no longer be a devil but a good spirit. So there are thousands of men who hold what would be considered a correct belief concerning God, and yet they are bad men—not devils but somewhat devilish. They swear by the God they believe in; they pray to him also. They would not think of denying his existence, nor of disowning their dependence upon him, nor of disallowing his power over them and all the universe; but nevertheless they are not men to be trusted, not even such as they are one can respect. We all know that every Christian community has many such men in it; the churches also contain them by scores and hundreds,—men in whose written or unwritten creeds the foremost article is a confession of faith in God; and yet they are men who by their direct influence make the world no wiser nor better nor happier for their living in it. But if these men could be brought to put practical goodness foremost in their belief, to lay their heavy emphasis on virtue, and to esteem character desirable before all things,—they would be such men as would command the confidence and respect of every one, and as would greatly bless and benefit mankind.

For I have observed, again, that those who make much of goodness, who put their faith in that more than in anything else, who desire it more than all other things for themselves and others,—I have observed that such are what may be called good men and benefactors, without the slightest reference to the church or party they belong to, or to any belief they have upon any other subject whatsoever. I have been forced by my experience and observation to allow, that a man can be a good man, can even be a religious man, with or without a belief in God,—such a belief as commonly prevails among theists; and I have been led also to allow, that it more conduces to the benefit of the individual and the race to have a true morality than to have a true theology. While I believe in God, and wish all men might, I know that many do not. I know at least that many say they do not, or that they express themselves in a way which indicates they have no such belief in God as seems to me most true and satisfying. I would certainly be very cautious how I apply the word atheist to any man. I would wish him to be very cautious how he applies it to himself, for not all is atheism which is called so. But if a man intelligently and deliberately says he is an atheist, or says that he is not a theist, or in substance expresses himself to this effect, I am bound to believe him.

Now some of the foremost thinkers of the world have not been theists; they have not believed in God as the Christian Bible sets him forth, and as most in the Christian community receive him. And yet many of these great thinkers—atheists according to the ordinary ecclesiastical interpretation—have been noble men, distinguished no less for their virtues than for their talents. Spinoza was one of these, who was no theist according to the ordinary understanding of that word, but who had yet a character which shone all over with the brightest of human graces. He believed in goodness, and was himself an eminently good man. Another, David Hume—one of the most able writers as well as noted skeptics whom England ever produced—was in his life and character estimable in a rare degree. It was said of him by another equally eminent man, "that he approached as nearly to the idea of a perfectly wise and virtuous man as perhaps the nature of human frailty will admit." He believed, it would seem, in goodness whatever else he disbelieved, and set an example as a thoroughly good man to those who were more correct in their theology but not in their morality than he. The same is true of some of our greatest modern thinkers who do not accept the common idea of God, who indeed are not theists; many of them are conspicuous in their lives and characters for "sweetness" as well as "light," for purity and uprightness of an excellent type. John Stuart Mill and Herbert Spencer of England alone are sufficient to be named as examples. And there is a no inconsiderable class in this country whose belief verges towards and perhaps stands squarely upon atheism, who yet are among our best, most respectable, and most reliable citizens. They are believers in goodness, and strive after it; and I observe that some of them attain to it in a degree which compares most favorably with the attainments in the same direction of their more "orthodox" fellow-men.

Not long since, I went to visit a man who had been reported to me as an atheist, wishing myself to see him and talk with him—not indeed expecting to convert him, convinced that he would not be able to convert me, but desiring to know and hear from his own lips what he had to say for his belief or disbelief. I found him a very candid and frank man, and withal a very thoughtful and serious one; seeming to me to be not at all dogmatic in his positions, not in the least flippant nor irreverent. He plainly said that he considered himself an atheist and called himself so; that he did not believe in God as the Christians did,—not even as he thought perhaps I did,—neither in a future life, although he expressed a willingness to believe in both if they could be proved to him, and said he hoped especially that the latter doctrine might be true. But I found that this man, although disusing even the word religion, had what I should not hesitate to say was his religion; and, when by inquiry I sought to discover what it was, I learned that it was to do right so far as he knew what right was. He had a most genuine desire to be good and do good. He aspired to know the truth. He believed firmly in honesty and veracity, loved what was pure and virtuous, admired and in some sort worshipped the beautiful and excellent. He was in favor of every social reform, and gave his influence on the side of that which tends to make the community more moral and to produce righteousness among men. And, so far as I have been able to learn from the testimony of those who know him, I believe this man to be an upright, reliable, faithful citizen; kind, benevolent, and just in all social and human relations.

My interview with this man taught me a new lesson of charity, and with other experience and observation I have had it led me to put a weightier estimate upon character as above dogma, and upon genuine goodness as above any speculative belief. And I presume it is the case with most of us, that, when we can long enough forget our controversies and our commitment to this or that form of doctrine, we do esteem our fellow men to be worthy or unworthy our confidence according as they are truly good in character and life, or otherwise. If a man moves into our neighborhood and turns out to be a bad neighbor,—morose, sullen, disobliging, selfish, and unsympathetic,—we very soon come to wish to have as little to do with him as possible, and to see him removed far from us; and this without the least regard to whether he goes or goes not to church, or whether in his religious belief he is theist, deist, pantheist, or atheist. I suppose that well nigh every business man, when he is visited in his store or shop by one who comes to purchase his goods, cares first of all to know if his would-be customer is a man who pays his honest debts, if he is just, fair, honorable, straightforward, reliable; and when he is satisfied that this is the case, then I presume he will consider his legitimate inquiries answered, and will proceed to sell his goods to this person who has money or credit, caring very little if he is a Christian, a Jew, a Mohammedan, or a Buddhist. It would be difficult, perhaps, for any one of us to describe to the other exactly and fully the kind of God we believe in; and even if we should succeed in doing so, we might not be able to convince each other that we are any better or more trustworthy for such a belief. But I take it that we could very easily come to a common statement of our belief in real goodness; and if we could succeed in convincing each other that we truly desired this for ourselves and others before everything else, I think we should find we stood on a large platform together, in which there was no dogma to bind any one of us, but where there prevailed a free spirit of aspiration and endeavor towards individual and general betterment.

The reason, I think, why a belief in goodness before all things has a more immediately reformatory and beneficial effect on such as hold it, than belief in God or any other belief, is that these other beliefs are more theoretical and pass less easily out of theory into practice. They are speculative beliefs, and can be held by the understanding even while the heart and the conscience do not lay hold of them nor become animated by them. But the belief in goodness has its chief root in the moral sense, and cannot be held long as a foremost theory without passing into practice, because the conscience and the heart are behind it spurring it on. Philosophers, metaphysicians, theologians, discuss God and define him, and come to the conclusion that he is or that he is not; and if he is that he is this, that, or the other. And often they do this in the narrow and dogmatic spirit of controversy and rivalry of opposing schools and parties, and little benefit comes forth of it thus to anybody. But when men get to talking about goodness, and become interested in the thing itself; when they are convinced that it is something within their reach, and something desirable for themselves and others,—then their minds are not only quickened but their whole moral sense is stirred also; and then, theology or no theology, they rise to a common morality, and their ideal beckons them on, and they pursue to find its realization.

I would therefore change the words of one of the Bible writers, when he says, "Trust in the Lord and do good," by transposing the two clauses of the sentence and making it to read thus: "Do good and trust in the Lord." I would do this for two reasons. First, because I would wish to give the more important and vital precept precedence—believing that morality is of more consequence to the world than theology, and that the directest way for most men to arrive at God, or the Perfect Good, is through love rather than thought. And, second, because it is nobler and more ennobling to do good for goodness' sake, than it is to do good for God's sake, or Christ's sake, or our own sake.

The common and popular belief in God, it seems to me, partakes largely of selfishness. Most men seem to believe in God as their great banker, with whom they deposit the small coin of obedience, expecting that he will pay it out to them with generous interest on the principal, in the shape of rewards that shall come in this life and more largely in the next. In order to induce them therefore to do good, they require first to be assured that there is a Being who stands ready to reward them for their goodness, by giving to them "salvation" and making it pleasant for them either here or hereafter. This indeed is the idea that lurks behind the Scripture words which I have quoted, as is indicated by what follows in the rest of the sentence. "Trust in the Lord and do good," the writer says, for, "so shalt thou dwell in the land and verily thou shalt be fed." Here the expected reward is named—the inducement, the pay—for doing good. Believe therefore or trust in one who is able and willing to remunerate you, before you begin to do good,—this is the teaching of the ancient precept as it comes to us unchanged. The same idea was in the minds of Jesus' disciples, when they went to him and, using Peter for a mouthpiece, said to him, "Lo! we left what we had and followed thee: where now is our reward?"

But all this rests on a low plain of religious thought. It comes from an inadequate idea of Duty, and a misapprehension of the claims of the Moral Law. Duty commands us, it does not seek to bribe us; it is not an envoy sent to us from God under a flag of truce, to stipulate with us the terms on which we will render compliance, but it approaches us in its own right and demands an unconditional obedience. The Moral Law does not come to us with a reward in one hand and a punishment in the other, but it presents its majestic form, speaking in the words of high dictation, and says, DO RIGHT FOR CONSCIENCE' SAKE AND NONE OTHER!

It is ignoble and puerile in us to think of the price we are going to be paid for being virtuous, and to say in effect that we will not venture on the thorny and dangerous road of Duty, unless we can have a traveller's insurance that we shall be indemnified for every mishap. This is to reduce morality to a mere mercantile standard, and to make of the high transactions between the soul and God, or between Conscience and the Moral Law, a mere bargain and consideration of what to give and take. A Christian theist who believes in God as one who will reward him richly for his good deeds and give him a bright and happy and endless "heaven" for all his brief toils and pains on earth, and who takes this solacing union to his soul as his chief encouragement to do right, has not so brave a virtue or so magnanimous a morality as he who, without believing in God or heaven or immortality, yet loves goodness for goodness' sake and perseveres to be true to it under the great injunction of the Moral Law. We have no right, when Duty presents itself to us and commands our obedience, to ask, Is it safe to obey—shall we be likely to succeed if we do this—shall we please man and God by this course and be sure to get our reward somehow, sometime? The only question we have any business to entertain is, What is right—what is truly good—what does Duty require of me under these circumstances? And when we have settled these questions, then whether a God is or is not, whether Fate or Providence rules, whether heaven or hell is to come, whether final annihilation or glorious immortality awaits us,—it is our only immediate and most noble concern to go forward in the path of right, to do our duty faithfully, to be loyal unto the inspiring Voice that calls on us from within! This is to be truly moral, this is to be religious indeed; and if it can be given us to know that there is a God and a future life, we may be sure that nowhere will these great truths shine upon us so clearly as when we are walking in the way of duty and persevering to do good.

The morality and religion of our time seem to me to have great timidity mingled with them, almost cowardice in fact, and much of the mercenary spirit. I would they could be made more magnanimous, more heroic, more disinterested. I would that more of the soldierly quality might be infused into them; that men might come to feel that this life is a battle-ground, a glorious warfare for truth and right, and that as soldiers under this banner we are called upon to perform deeds of great self-sacrifice and daring, uninfluenced in the least by the ordinary considerations of safety, ease, quiet, popularity, and reward,—that in short our only duty is to obey orders as they come to us from the headquarters of Conscience and the Moral Sense. Oh that we might be able, as hardy soldiers of truth and right, to take if need be our single blanket and canteen and bivouac on the field of life,—making the rock of trial our pillow, making the night of disaster our pavilion of safety and repose, having our trust in nothing less than superior virtue; willing to stay or march, to endure or do, to engage alone or with a host, determined only that we will acquit ourselves manfully and well so long as the campaign shall last, whether bounty and pay reward us at the end or not!

I am quite well satisfied that belief in God and immortality is a matter greatly belonging to individual constitution and temperament, or perhaps to a particular adjustment and culture of all the faculties. It is natural and easy for some to believe in these spiritual facts—if facts they be—but for others it is not. I find it easy myself to believe in them. I believe in them, however, not because some person or book has told me they are credible, but because like the stars shining down into the mirrored bosom of the lake so these twin truths from the night of the unknown seem to shine with their calm light into my soul. I hope they are fixed there. I trust they may never be entirely nor permanently clouded, though I would not believe against evidence, nor without it. I look to Science—not false but true Science; not that Science which is mole-eyed, burrowing only in the earth, but that which is open-eyed and clear, whose vision sweeps the whole horizon, taking in all the facts and phenomena of soul and sense, of mind and matter,—to such a Science I look as the great impartial arbiter in the domain of spiritual as well as physical truth. But without Pharisaism I thank God and rejoice for the sublime hints I have received that he is, and that, because he is, I am and shall be! Through all thought and reasoning, through all doubt and uncertainty, through all trouble and trial—from none of which would I shrink—may these hints continue to impress me more and more, growing at last into a strong assurance that shall fill me with sweet peace and blessing!

But there are many who do not entertain these hints or beliefs; who for one cause or another have given them up, or perhaps have never quite accepted them. It may be that an increasing number are in this condition—in the condition of doubt and uncertainty as to all spiritual facts. But a considerable number of such I am glad to believe are thoughtful and serious persons; nay, more, they are very conscientious and pure-minded. Though they have an eclipse of faith concerning God and immortality, they have none concerning personal goodness and integrity, concerning the claims of Conscience and the Moral Law. Far be it from me to arrogate to myself any superiority to such, or to look down upon them either with severity or with pity. On the contrary, I admire their sincerity and candor, their conscientious allegiance to personal conviction. In a Christian community it does not meet with popular favor to declare oneself an atheist, or a pantheist even, or a doubter concerning the existence of spirit; therefore only those will be likely to do so who are deeply earnest, sincere, and thoughtful. How many of those who now say they believe in God would be willing to say the same in a community where such a sentiment would be received with almost universal condemnation, perhaps with persecutions, imprisonments, fines, martyrdom? A good test of the purity and strength of a conviction is one's utter devotion to it. "Show me what you are willing to die for," said a prominent Unitarian clergyman to me not long since, "and I will admire and respect you however much you differ from me." All atheists and pantheists and materialists differ from me, but if they honestly hold to their conviction they are as much to be respected as I am; and more too, if with their views they live a better life than I do with mine. My fellowship is open to embrace all who "do good," whether they "trust in the Lord" or not.

It was long since made plain that men cannot agree in their speculative beliefs, and that they were never made so to agree,—for it is not the privilege of a man to believe what he wants to and wills to: he has to believe what he can, what indeed he must, according as the evidence and his own conviction bear in favor of or against a particular point. But it has never been shown that men cannot unite in a faith in goodness, in a love of holiness, in an admiration for virtue, in an aspiration and endeavor towards perfection. In these things all can agree and harmonize. From devotion to these come the highest welfare and benefit, the truest peace and satisfaction of the individual and the race.

THE VOYSEY MOVEMENT.—A gentleman has offered to erect a church for the ministrations of the Rev. Charles Voysey if a suitable site in London can be obtained. Among those who are supporting the movement are Alderman Sir Sydney Waterlow, Sir John Lubbock, Bart., M. P., Sir John Bowring, Sir F. Elliott, Mr. Darwin, Sir C. Palmer, Mr. Joseph Brown, Q. C., and (it is said) several benefited clergymen of the Established Church.—The Graphic (London.)

My DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

Having been a few days ago on a visit to Syracuse, N. Y., I visited again the Radical Club, as I did on my last year's visit, when on a most courteous invitation I gave them a short lecture. This time, too, I was welcomed in a most friendly manner by some of my old acquaintances; and the lady-president of the Club, in announcing the subject of the evening's discussion, "Mental Freedom," took occasion to acquaint the audience with my presence, stating also that I gave them a lecture on my last visit, and expressing a wish that I would speak again this evening and open the discussion. I could not, of course, refuse to say a few words.

In speaking of "mental freedom," I began by taking exception to the epithet "mental," and by declaring myself so thoroughly a Materialist that I had no conception of the "mental"—of "mind" or "soul" or "spirit." Man, as I conceive him, is nothing but an animal, an animal endowed with eminent and various faculties, it is true, in some of which he is far superior, and in others far inferior, to other animals. In the "higher" ones, it will readily be admitted that he excels them all, and especially in those which arise from his cerebral activity, and are generally called "mental qualities." Yet these "mental qualities" are just as truly physical, just as much dependent on the physical organism, as are any of those which are unanimously called "physical" or "bodily" faculties, and are conceded to have a material or bodily origin and foundation. Hence "mind," "soul," or "spirit" have no existence as entities, but are merely the results of our physical organization. There can then, in reality, be no such thing as "mental freedom." It is merely cerebral action, and hence physical in its nature. For mental freedom, like all so-called mental qualities, depends on the quality of the brain, on its development and perfection, which depend again on the character of the whole physical organization and on education. The condition of the brain forms the foundation for the condition of the "mind" or the "mental qualities." Just in proportion as the brain is large, healthy, and well developed, a man will be wise and intelligent; in proportion as the brain is small and imperfect, he will be foolish, ignorant, idiotic. The fundamental difference between a philosopher and an idiot is their respective quantity and quality of brain.

These are facts so well attested that they need no proof. When we nevertheless speak of "mind," or "spirit," or of "mental qualities," we do so through the force of habit, by a long-familiar use of these terms, and not by virtue of their existence in reality. These terms are merely metaphysical relics from a time when metaphysics were even less correctly understood than they now are, imperfectly as they are understood today. It is for these very same reasons that we divide the "mind" in metaphysics into the three main divisions—cognition, sentiment, will; not because the "mind" (admitting or supposing its existence as an entity) is composed of these three main powers, but merely the better to explain and to understand the "mind" itself; that is, the various results of the actions of the brain considered as an objective "mind."

I am well aware how sharply these theories will be contested, how strongly they are in conflict with generally adopted opinions, with the religious views not only of the Orthodox, but of the majority of men generally, and how earnestly even you, my much-esteemed friend, will oppose them; and yet, I think, facts, science, and experience will fully sustain them. The fact is patent that what we eat and drink, whether we be joyous, happy, and in good "spirits," or sad, unhappy, sorrowful, has a corresponding effect not only on our physical organism and bodily well-being but reacts on our nervous system, and through it on the brain and "mind." It is generally agreed that the "mind" controls our actions and physical desires; yet let a temperate man take a large glass of liquor, or lie in high fever, and his "mind" will be "wandering," while, when the same liquor is taken in but a small quantity, it will stimulate the "mind."

Again: if the Darwinian theory of the "Descent of Man" be correct (and the most forward men of science accept it thus), it speaks very strongly for the correctness of the above theory.

Experience also furnishes daily proofs of this correctness. I read some time ago (I forget where) of a man who, while passing a building in process of erection in company with a friend, was struck by a falling brick. He fell senseless on the ground, and was in this state brought to a hospital, where he lay for weeks senseless and motionless, neither dead nor alive. The physicians dared not extract the brick from the skull in which it struck fast, fearing to injure the brain and cause death. Finally they concluded that something had to be done, and they resolved to remove the brick. This was no sooner done than the man revived, regained his consciousness and speech, which he resumed by finishing that very sentence which had been interrupted by his injury. Now where was that man's "mind" or "soul" all that time that he lay unconscious? Was it within the man? Why did he or could he not act or show consciousness? Was it out of the man? How could the removal of the brain bring it back? The action of the brain was arrested by the pressure of the brick on it; hence there was no consciousness—no "mind;" but as soon as the brick, and with it the pressure on the brain, was removed, the action of the brain was resumed, and consciousness and "mind" were restored.

Do not all these, and the thousand similar facts occurring daily, prove conclusively that "mind," "spirit," or "soul," is but the will, and the brain or human organism, its action or results, the essence or the thing?

Further, the brain of the new-born child is proportionately small, but is growing faster during the years of childhood than at any other period of life. The "mind," too, develops fastest in that period. During the period of manhood, when the brain is most fully developed, it grows very little and very slowly—it has reached its perfection; hence the "mind," also, reaches its perfection and strength during that period. With the beginning of old age (about sixty) the brain decreases again, hence also the energy of the "mind," which not unfrequently diminishes until it reaches again its "second childhood."

All these and numberless other facts prove conclusively, I think, that there is no such thing as "mind," "spirit," or "soul;" that these terms are mere names for the different phenomena, the different results of the human organism in its normal activity, invented to cover our ignorance of metaphysics,—just as we, for similar reasons, still use the name "God" for the "Unknown" and "Unknowable," to express our ignorance of Nature, the Universe, and the Forces in Nature; or the word "Religion" to express our ignorance of "God" and "divine things and relations." And, forsooth, because the older theologians used the word God in their ignorance to designate thereby the "Creator, Governor, and Preserver of the Universe," we still use this word in our ignorance to designate by it Nature, the Universe, and the Laws and Forces of or in them,—and the word "Religion" to designate our imagined relations to this imagined God.

Yours for emancipated reason,

MORRIS EINSTEIN.

TITUSVILLE, Pa., Sept. 26, 1872.

[We are aware how plausible is the mode of reasoning above followed; but that there are two sides to the general question discussed, and that our esteemed correspondent leaves out of view some very important elements of it, will partly appear from the subjoined article.—Ed.]

PROTOPLASM.

[From "Introduction to the Study of Biology," by Prof. H. Altyne Nicholson. D. Appleton & Co. 1872. Pages 6-11.]

The first of the questions as to the conditions of life which it is necessary to consider, is whether the phenomena of vitality are necessarily associated with any particular form of matter, or with any special "physical basis," as it has been aptly termed. The answer to this question may with little hesitation be given in the affirmative. It does not at all appear that the phenomena of life can be manifested by any and every form of matter; and a very little reflection ought to convince us that it would be very surprising if the reverse of this were the case. There is no physical or chemical force which can be rendered manifest to us by all and sundry forms of matter, and it would be indeed remarkable if the case were otherwise with the forces of the living organism. When, for example, we say that certain forms of matter, such as the metals, are conductors of electricity, and certain other forms, such as glass, are non-conductors, we are in truth saying that electricity requires for its manifestation a certain "physical basis." Upon merely theoretical grounds, therefore, we might have assumed the existence of a "matter of life," or a physical basis absolutely necessary for the manifestation of vital phenomena. This physical basis of life is known by the now notorious name of "protoplasm," or, as it is better termed by Dr. Beale, "bioplasm."

As regards its nature, protoplasm, though capable of being built up into the most complex structures, does not necessarily exhibit anything which can be looked upon as organization or differentiation into distinct parts; and its chemical composition is the only constant which can be approximately stated. It consists, namely, of carbon, oxygen, nitrogen, and hydrogen, united into a proximate compound to which Mulder applied the name of "proteine," and which is very nearly identical with albumen or white-of-egg. It further appears probable that all forms of protoplasm can be made to contract by electricity, and are liable to undergo that peculiar coagulation at a temperature of 40°-50° centigrade, which has been called "heat-stiffening" (Huxley). Protoplasm, therefore, may be regarded as a general term for all forms of albuminoid matter; and, in this general sense, we may safely assert that protoplasm is the "physical basis" of life; or, in other words, that vital phenomena cannot be manifested except through the medium of a protoplasmic body. It is to be borne in mind, however, that it has not yet been shown that all the forms of matter which we include under the conveniently loose term of "protoplasm" have a constant and undeviating chemical composition. It must also be remembered that there are certain other substances, such as some of the mineral salts, which though only present in small quantity nevertheless appear to be absolutely essential to the maintenance of life, at the same time that their exact use is not at present known. It seems certain, then, that no body is capable of manifesting the marvellous phenomena of life, unless it be composed of some form or other of albuminous or protoplasmic matter. We know, at any rate, of no such body at present, and we are therefore justified in asserting that the presence of an albuminous basis is an essential condition of vitality. Most naturalists probably would subscribe to this statement; but there are two different senses in which it would be received. Some eminent authorities insist that albuminous matter or protoplasm is not only a condition of vitality, but that it is its cause; or, in other words, that life is one of the properties of protoplasm. It is asserted, namely, that life is the result of the combined properties of the elements which form albuminous matter, just as the properties of water are the resultant of the combined properties of its constituents, hydrogen and oxygen; and it is alleged that it is just as absurd to set down the phenomena of life to an assumed "vital force," as it would be to ascribe the properties of water to an assumed "aquosity." On the other hand, equally eminent philosophers would assert that the view just mentioned is one which confounds effect with cause, and that albuminous matter is at best but a condition of vitality, just as the presence of a conductor may be said to be an essential condition of electricity. The question as to which of these two opposing views has most in its favor, is one of sufficient importance to warrant a brief exposition of the grounds upon which a decision may be arrived at.

In the first place, when we come to sum up the actual data upon which such a decision should be formed, it is clear that we know two factors only of the case. We recognize certain phenomena which we call "vital," as being exclusively manifested by living beings. We recognize further, that these phenomena are never manifested except by certain forms of matter, or, it may be, by but a single form of matter. We conclude, therefore, that there must be an intimate connection between vital phenomena and the "matter of life;" but we can go no further than this, and the premises do not in any way warrant the assertion that life is the result of living matter, or one of its properties. We know the succession of phenomena, but we know no more, and it is not possible to decide dogmatically which phenomenon precedes the other in point of time. It is therefore just as reasonable to believe that the matter of life is the result of vital forces as the reverse; and, as far as mere logic is concerned, neither view can claim the smallest advantage over the other.

If we take such a microscopic animalcule as the Amoeba, or, still better, one of the yet more humble organisms which are known as Paramecium, we are presented with a little speck of animal matter, a little particle of albumen, almost or quite destitute of structure, and yet exhibiting all the essential phenomena of vitality. Such a particle of living matter is undoubtedly the seat of certain forces which render it different from any and every collocation of mere dead particles. Whether we call these forces vital or not matters little; but we certainly are not at present justified, by any evidence in our hands, in asserting that they are merely a form of energy or motion.

No one has hitherto succeeded in demonstrating how any form or any combination of any of the known physical or chemical forces should produce the vital phenomena which are seen to occur in the albuminous matter of even the most humble of animals. Until such a demonstration can be brought forward, we are not only justified, but we are bound, to look at the forces at work in living matter as something (outside and beyond) the mere physical forces. We may call these forces "vital" or not, as we choose, but the fact will either way remain the same.

Again, every one will willingly admit that all compound substances possess certain properties which are the result of the combined properties of their component elements. Water, for example, is composed of hydrogen and oxygen, and its properties are the resultant of the combined properties of these two gases. It is a definite chemical compound, having definite and constant properties, and there is no kind of necessity for ascribing the properties of water to any assumed principle of "aquosity." It is to be remembered, however, that there is only one kind of water, and its properties are universally the same. In the same way, albuminous matter, or protoplasm, is a chemical compound which unquestionably possesses certain properties of its component elements. But this is dead protoplasm of which this is true, and unless this be granted it is difficult to see how to avoid having to deny that dead protoplasm can exist at all. It is conceivable—nay, more, it is one of the splendid possibilities of the future—that the chemist should succeed in forcing the elements of albuminous matter to combine with one another, and thus in manufacturing protoplasm artificially in the laboratory. But this would be dead albuminous matter; and it is wholly inconceivable that the utmost advances of constructive chemistry should ever lead to the manufacture of living protoplasm. Dead albuminous matter may be regarded as a tolerably definite and uniform chemical compound, and its properties are, beyond doubt, the resultant of those of its component elements. Like water, therefore, dead protoplasm has universally the same physical and chemical properties. Living protoplasm, on the other hand, though still unchanged in chemical composition and physical characters, exhibits the most varied properties, according as its forms enter into the composition of different animals. If, then, we are to ascribe vital phenomena to the inherent constitution of living matter—in the sense that the properties of water are those of its component gases—we are left to account, as best we may, for the utterly immeasurable differences between the vital phenomena of a man and of a sponge, both of which may be regarded as composed fundamentally of the same materials.

The more philosophical view, then, as to the nature of the connection between life and its material basis, is the one which regards vitality as something superadded and foreign to the matter by which vital phenomena are manifested. Protoplasm is essential as the physical medium through which vital action may be manifested; just as a conductor is essential to the manifestation of electric phenomena, or just as a paint brush and colors are essential to the artist. Because metal conducts the electric current, and renders it perceptible to our senses, no one thinks of therefore asserting that electricity is one of the inherent properties of a metal, any more than one would feel inclined to assert that the power of painting was inherent in the camel's hair or in the dead pigments. Behind the material substratum, in all cases, is the active and living force; and we have no right to assume that the force ceases to exist when its physical basis is removed, though it is no longer perceptible to our senses. It is, on the contrary, quite conceivable theoretically that the vital forces of an organism should suffer no change by the destruction of the physical basis, just as electricity would continue to subsist in a wire composed universally of non-conductors. In neither case could the force manifest its presence, or be brought into any perceptible relation with the outer world; but in neither case should we have the smallest ground for assuming that the power was necessarily non-existent.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at ODEON HALL, St. Clair Street, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

CASH RECEIPTS.

Cash Receipts for the week ending October 10.—Mrs. C. A. Barber, 10 cts.; A. A. Knight, 50 cts.; Robert A. McKee, 50 cts.; Mrs. W. F. Ruman, 50 cts.; Jonathan Watson, 50 cts.; Miss Fanny Brown, 50 cts.; Mrs. A. J. S. Johnson, 50 cts.; Mrs. Chas. Willis, 50 cts.; N. Sullivan, 25 cts.; Mrs. Lurella Mott, 50 cts.; J. Robbins, 50 cts.; R. Montgomery, 50 cts.; D. S. Caldwell, 50 cts.; H. H. Potter, 50 cts.; David Fry, 50 cts.; E. F. Yarrington, 50 cts.; Thos. Davis, 50 cts.; D. B. Harris, 50 cts.; Geo. W. Carpenter, Jr., 50 cts.; R. G. Ingels, 50 cts.; W. Karcher, 50 cts.; Edward R. Babcock, 50 cts.; L. W. Hammond, 50 cts.; J. H. Mason, 50 cts.; Clark J. Jones, 50 cts.; W. N. Clark, 50 cts.; T. Mumford, 50 cts.; Dr. J. E. Swift, 50 cts.; Robt. A. McKenzie, 50 cts.; H. E. Mann, 50 cts.; Morris Einstein, 50 cts.; Mrs. E. Sargent, 50 cts.; Wm. Green, 50 cts.; Dr. F. A. Bonham, 50 cts.; A. H. Wimbish, 50 cts.; Mrs. Jno. A. Needles, 50 cts.; Alfred Robinson, 50 cts.; Joseph Mehl, 50 cts.; H. F. Sibley, 50 cts.; J. L. Richter, 50 cts.; Geo. D. Haworth, 50 cts.; H. H. Brown, 50 cts.; O. F. Harris, 50 cts.; E. S. Cross, 50 cts.; Jno. Hower, 50 cts.; W. W. Rice, 50 cts.; G. F. Thompson, 50 cts.; Dexter Rice, 50 cts.; W. McFarland, 50 cts.; Potter & Ball, 50 cts.; H. B. Buck, 50 cts.; R. Champion, 50 cts.; S. Forehand, 50 cts.; N. H. Sherman, 50 cts.; Danforth Harris, 50 cts.; Frank Delmer, 50 cts.; Fannie Wertz, 50 cts.; J. W. Routh, 50 cts.; C. G. French, 50 cts.; Rev. J. M. L. Babcock, 50 cts.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

N. B.—THE INDEX is payable in advance. Its friends should not be offended if the paper is stopped at the expiration of their terms as indicated by the mail-tags. We have no means of knowing whether they wish it continued or not except by the receipt or non-receipt of the subscription price.

RECEIVED.

A HAN BOOK OF CHEMICAL TECHNOLOGY. By RUDOLPH WAGNER, Ph. D., Professor of Chemical Technology at the University of Würzburg. Translated from the Eighth German Edition, with Extensive Additions, by WILLIAM CHAPMAN, F. R. S. With 356 Illustrations. New York: D. APPLETON & Co., 549 and 551 Broadway, 1872. 8vo. pp. 745.

TOWN GEOLOGY. By the Rev. CHARLES KINGSLEY, F. L. S., F. G. S., Canon of Chester. New York: D. APPLETON & Co., 549 and 551 Broadway, 1873. 16mo. pp. 228.

THE DOVE IN THE EAGLE'S NEST. By the Author of "The Help of God's Love." New York: D. APPLETON & Co. 1872. 16mo. pp. 389.

REPORT OF THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY FOR THE WEST OF THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION TO THE WESTERN CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN CHURCHES. Given at Meadville, Penn., June 17th, 1872. Quilley, Ill.: TRIBUNE STREAM PRINTING HOUSE, 1872.

TO ARMAGEDDON! A Plea for the Authority and Law of God as delivered to Moses, the Law for the Millennium. By JAMES MILLER BOWEN. Printed for the Author by S. B. HOWARD, 374 Cornhill, 1870.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.
CAPITAL, $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.
The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 26, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.
ACKNOWLEDGED elsewhere. Seven Hundred and Fifty Shares.
JOHN J. STEVENS, Oswego, N. Y.,	One	Share	100
C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, "	"	"	100
J. HENRY CLARKE, "	"	"	100
E. B. WALDO, "	"	"	100
G. N. STANLEY, "	"	"	100
JOHN M. HICE, "	"	"	100
MARSHALL BROS., Minneapolis, Minn.,	"	"	100
S. LYDIARD, Loug Lake, "	"	"	100
J. G. RICHARDSON, Lake City, "	One	"	100
DR. D. K. BOUTELLE, "	"	"	100
R. E. GREENHAW, Minneapolis, Minn.,	"	"	100
Mrs. E. COBURN, Portage City, Wis.,	"	"	100
WM. H. ELLERY, Burlington, Iowa,	"	"	100
LYMAN T. OSBORN, Auburn, N. Y.,	"	"	100
P. C. TUNNEY, Albany, "	"	"	100
M. SCHLESINGER, "	"	"	100
JOSEPH KNIGHT, Troy, Ohio,	"	"	100
L. S. BRYANT, Dayton, "	"	"	100
L. F. GARDNER, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.,	"	"	100
J. C. CHARTERTON, Rutherford Park, N. J.,	"	"	100
W. J. LEWIS, Illinois, "	"	"	100
HARVEY HAKES, Worcester, Mass.,	"	"	100
THEO. BROWN, "	"	"	100
C. W. ESTERHROOK, Boston, "	"	"	100
E. B. LORING, "	Five	"	500
JURIN RUDOUT, "	Three	"	300
A. FOLGOM, (in trial), "	One	"	100
JOHN WETTERBERG, "	"	"	100
P. A. GREENE, "	"	"	100
E. S. DUNHAM, "	Two	"	200
N. CUMINGS, "	One	"	100
CHAR. T. HOW, "	Three	"	300
GEO. H. FOSTER, "	One	"	100
A. A. KNIGHT, "	"	"	100
GARDNER MURPHY, "	"	"	100
GEO. HENSHAW, "	"	"	100
HENRY N. STONE, "	"	"	100
H. E. MANN, Fond du Lac, Wis.,	"	"	100
GODFREY GUNDERM, Ionia, Mich.,	One	"	100
E. H. HENSHAW, Boston, Mass.,	Two	"	200
W. C. GANSEY, "	One	"	100
Mrs. K. G. WELLS, Taylor's Falls, Minn.,	"	"	100
OSCAR ROOS, Union City, Mich.,	"	"	100
J. D. ZIMMERMAN, Union City, Mich.,	"	"	100
PHILIP A. ZIMMERMAN, "	"	"	100
GEORGE HUBBARD, "	"	"	100
S. H. NYE, "	"	"	100
CHAR. B. SPRING, "	"	"	100
D. D. W. ROOSE, "	"	"	100
G. K. WITHINGTON, Cincinnati, O.,	"	"	100
JONATHAN WATSON, Timberville, Pa.,	"	"	100
MORRIS EINHORN, "	"	"	100
Mrs. J. J. PHILSBURY, Ravenna, O.,	Two	"	200
Mrs. J. J. PHILSBURY, Evansville, Ind.,	One	"	100
MARY SHANNON, Newton, Mass.,	Four	"	400
MART C. SHANNON, "	One	"	100
R. L. BAKER, Ft. Fairfield, Me.,	"	"	100
J. P. FLAHER, St. Louis, Mo.,	"	"	100
E. G. WINDEGGER, Alton, Ill.,	"	"	100
D. R. SPARKS, Litchfield, N. Y.,	"	"	100
WESLEY BEST, New York, "	"	"	100
D. THOMAS, "	"	"	100
LEWIS G. JONES, "	"	"	100
M. B. BRYANT, "	Two	"	200
JOHN W. CHAUVICK, Brooklyn, N. Y.,	One	"	100
E. S. DUNHAM, Boston, Mass.,	Two	"	200
ISAAC AMES, Richmond, Ind.,	Three	"	300
CHAR. LEIVE, Dayton, Ohio,	One	"	100
GEO. C. DUNHAM, Olneyville, R. I.,	"	"	100
CHRIS. A. DAY, Providence, "	"	"	100
GEO. LEWIS, "	"	"	100
J. D. FRONT, Worcester, Mass.,	"	"	100
CLARK JILLSON, Valley Falls, R. I.,	"	"	100
A. B. CHASE, Cincinnati, Ohio,	"	"	100
G. E. WITHINGTON, North Platte, Neb.,	Two	"	200
S. F. PUTNAM, "	"	"	100
			$81,900

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION: CONDITIONAL STOCK LIST.

WE, the undersigned, subscribers to the capital stock of the Index Association, agree to double our previous subscriptions to said stock on the same terms as before, taking respectively the additional number of shares set opposite to our names in the list below:

PROVIDED, That the full sum of One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000) shall have been subscribed in good faith by the twenty-sixth day of October, 1872—that is, within one year from the date when THE INDEX passed into the hands of the Index Association.

ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin, Pa.,	Five Shares,	$500
CHAS. A. GURLEY,	Paisley, N. Y.,	Two	200
MAX PHAOUT,	Cincinnati, Ohio,	"	100
J. N. LYMAN,	Columbus, "	One	100
WALTER F. AUSTIN,	Pittsburgh, Pa.,	Two	200
JAS. H. STONE,	Cincinnati, Ohio,	One	100
A. M. HOWLAND,	Boston, Mass.,	Five	500
J. C. ROONEY,	St. Louis, Mo.,	One	100
CHARLES POST,	Indianapolis, Ind.,	Two	200
CLEMENS VONNEKOT,	"	One	100
ALEX. METZGER,	"	"	100
			$3,400

SPECIAL NOTICE.—THE INDEX will be enlarged to sixteen pages at the commencement of its fourth volume, Jan. 1, 1873. After Sept. 28, 1872, the price of subscription will be $3.00 a year, in advance. But every subscriber, new or old, who remits $3.00 at once will be credited with a year's subscription from Jan. 1, and will meantime receive the paper free, if not already paid for.

"A man cannot be, at the same time, a bachelor and a husband, a citizen and a man without a country, a member of the Church of Christ and a Free Religionist." This was said by Rev. A. D. Mayo a year or two ago. We agree with him. But many excellent people think they believe in Christianity and Free Religion both. It will take time before the "irrepressible conflict" becomes manifest to all.

The Index.

OCTOBER 26, 1872.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

BUSINESS NOTICE.—All communications without exception, on all matters pertaining to the paper, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, DRAWERS, TOLEDO, OHIO." All cheques, drafts, and post office money orders, should be made payable to "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION." No responsibility is assumed for loss of money or neglect in the fulfilment of orders, unless these directions are STRICTLY COMPLIED WITH.

ENGLISH SOCIAL AMELIORATION.

Captain Maxse, of the British Royal Navy, has just given to the London public a lecture of about one hundred pages on the "Causes of Social Revolt," for a copy of which we acknowledge our indebtedness to the courtesy of the author. The lecture is a study of some of the lessons taught by the Paris Commune, and was delivered in London, Portsmouth, and other places. "Living as I have done from childhood," says Captain Maxse, "in an upper class atmosphere, and yet led by the irresistible force of conscientious conviction to espouse, as the cause of human justice, the democratic cause, I have become the political associate of its supporters, and have thus been continually occupied in listening to both sides."

The primary cause of social discontent in Great Britain, according to this bold and high-minded writer, is the terrible fact of wide-spread social misery. The huddled and wretched population of the great cities; the ill-paid and half-starving peasantry of the rural districts; the three millions of paupers saved from actual starvation by State support alone (including three hundred and fifty thousand children under sixteen years of age), and three millions more who have to be assisted to the bare necessities of life by their friends or by the parish; the oppression of seamen by merchants, of miners by mine-owners (a thousand lives a year being lost, chiefly by preventible causes), and of workmen by ironmasters,—all this presents an appalling picture of English society, and makes up in the gross, as Mr. Harrison says, the "social problem." The individual competitive theory that, "if each individual improve himself, we shall all be improved," seems profane trifling in face of the fact that the circumstances of life, in most of these cases, cut off all possibility of improvement. "Misery is a soil not propitious to the growth of moral excellence," said Dr. Hodgson; and he might have said it with greatly increased emphasis. Yet, in the forcible language of Captain Maxse: "Our boasted prosperity is logically based upon a deliberate calculation of a fixed and extensive element of human misery and helplessness; and without the fulfilment of this essential condition of its being, society, as at present constituted, must dissolve."

Political economy, in our author's opinion, with its selfish theory of free competition, offers no escape from these frightful evils. This so-called science has its great uses; but the error is to regard the conditions whence all this misery results as unalterable. The general remedy for such suffering is "the adoption of wise and generous measures, as far as possible to equalize the chances of life." More in detail, he recommends (1) compulsory, gratuitous, secular education; (2) land tenure reform; (3) the substitution of direct for indirect taxation; and (4) electoral representative reform. The impossibility of suppressing democratic aspirations by bayonets or acts of Parliament; the fallacy of supposing that the daily press of London really represents national opinion, and its attempt to ignore the large meetings held in favor of "compulsory education, compulsory School Board management, and compulsory unsectarianism;" the impracticability of establishing a daily radical paper in opposition (which in London would cost from £60,000 to £70,000); the stolid ignorance in the upper classes as to what is said and done, read and thought, in the lower classes; the aristocratic intolerance of all independent thinkers; the inevitable result of thus cutting off all communication of ideas between the various strata of society; the antagonism of town and country, and the disastrous away over the latter held by the clergy and landowners; the cry of "atheist" raised by the clergy against all social reformers; the two rival creeds of faith in the Past and faith in the Future; the necessity of organization, especially "Co-operative," but no less political,—all these topics are treated by Captain Maxse with a frankness of speech and a generosity of sentiment which must enlist the sympathies of every liberal reader. He shows with terrible fidelity the wretched state of the manual-labor class in England, which numbers not less than ten millions; and he says with equally terrible truthfulness that "this class has yet to inherit civilization." It is surely the augury of a better day when one who by his social position is exempted from the evils he depicts enters thus feelingly into the woes of others, and makes them his own.

For here is the only possible remedy for this gigantic misery and misrule which characterize all modern society. Social reform is the great, crying demand of the age; and, whatever may have been the sins of the Paris Commune, the stress it has put on the duty of society at large to pity and care for the sufferings of its obscurest and humblest members will never be forgotten. Not in any class organization, however, even that which Captain Maxse recommends, must the real panacea for social evils be sought, but rather in the voluntary association of society itself into a vast Co-operative Union for the welfare of each and every one of its component individuals. Out of class associations only class conflicts can proceed; and the evils now endured will not be lessened by stirring up internecine war in the heart of modern life.

Next week we expect to say something about the relation of Free Religion to Social Reform.

There is exquisite satire in the following passage of a novel by Gustave Droz, quoted in the Nation. Babolain is a young and well-to-do professor of mathematics, conversing with the mother of the young lady with whom he is in love. He says:—

"Are you afraid that her lungs are attacked?"
"I am afraid of everything, my friend. Now the trouble is only mental, I am sure, judging from her sudden changes from depressing melancholy to mad gaiety, from all the unaccountable things. For example, this morning I went into her room to see her, and I found her sitting in a corner completely absorbed in a little book that I have never seen in her hand before. I go up to her. 'What are you reading, my dear?' I say. Then she hands me the volume with that graceful, frank gesture that you must know."

"Yes, yes."
"Where was I? Oh! yes. I look at the book; it was a little arithmetic that she used to have at school. I said, smiling, 'You are beginning your studies again, my dear?' But she answered, throwing herself into my arms, and kissing me warmly, 'Oh! science is so beautiful, mamma, so beautiful!'"

In copying a large part of Professor Newman's essay entitled "On the Vision of Heaven," the Christian Statesman prefixes this editorial note, which breathes a singularly just and noblespirit in comparison with the comments usually made on THE INDEX by the Evangelical press:—

"The following article is from the pen of a teacher of 'Free Religion,' and is selected from the pages of THE INDEX. We give it partly that our readers may be better informed of the courteous, intelligent, and almost devout form in which the most radical unbelief presents itself to-day, and partly for its intrinsic worth and beauty. Many Christians see this beautiful Vision less clearly and with less emotion than this man to whom it appears as a baseless dream."

The article in the Religious Magazine headed "Our Denominational Hope," by Rev. Joseph May, appreciates fully what most rationalists fail to discern; namely, that the great spiritual power of Orthodoxy lies in its faith in Christ as God. It is a little surprising that an article which can so finely appreciate the innermost spirit of Orthodoxy should not also appreciate the fact that in Orthodoxy itself lies the great spiritual power of Christianity, and that pure theism is as distinct from Christianity as it is from Mohammedanism.

HOW SHALL WE MEET THE LABOR PROBLEM?

Mr. Phillips says that, in the event of Gen. Grant's election, the old issues of the war will be finally settled, and there will be opportunity for a discussion and settlement of the great questions of the Labor Movement. Mr. Greeley's friends promise us also an era of reconciliation and good feeling, in which we may make greater industrial progress than ever before.

Would there might be some happy period of theological reconciliation, when, having settled or consented to have unsettled the questions of the authority of Jesus, the exact meaning of this or that text of Scripture, or the precise nature of baptism, we could meet these great questions of Labor and social life thoughtfully and earnestly, instead of making them the text for angry discussion, or the opportunity for gaining political capital.

A most important question of this nature was raised by the accomplished philosopher, Mr. Harris, of St. Louis. Mr. Harris argues that the improvements in machinery constantly tend to the elevation of the laboring classes by releasing them from mere physical labor, and so bringing all artisans more nearly on a level as regards opportunity for intellectual improvement. He anticipates the time when the perfection of the mechanic arts will give development to the whole nature of the workman, and he will get education by means of his work, as well as in the leisure hours gained by the more rapid accomplishment of his task. This is certainly a very pleasing hope, and one that we feel ought in some way to be realized.

But on the other hand, Mr. Edward Atkinson, who has a large practical acquaintance with manufacturing life, gave it as the result of his experience that, up to a certain point, this view held true, but beyond that it failed: in other words, that it requires more exercise of the brain to use machinery than to work by hand, while the machinery is only partly automatic, but that, carried to the perfection of self-regulation, machinery asks only the dullest and most monotonous attendance on the part of the workman. A few master minds design the engines and superintend the whole, while the majority of those employed lose all spirit and energy and gain nothing from their occupation but the means of satisfying their physical wants. This opinion is corroborated by other manufacturers of large humanity and intelligence.

Now, is not this a most important problem, which demands the earnest consideration of every lover of humanity? It seems to be as impossible to resist the advancing tide of mechanical invention as to stop the tides in the Bay of Fundy; nor can we willingly accept the conclusion that such advance is against the interests of humanity. But, on the other hand, the laboring classes will always form the great bulk of the population; and if labor by machinery tends to degrade them intellectually, will it not lower the whole mental life of the world, so that we shall retrograde in our intellectual progress, and finally the course of invention be stopped for want of brains in the community, and our wonderful machines be counted among those "lost arts" of which history gives us the record?

Is there any fallacy in this latter view? Is there any corrective which will save the factory hand from sinking to the level of the tools he works with? Can we find any in his relation to the work itself? Or, conceding such a corrective to be unattainable, can we preserve his mental and moral life by education, by the artistic pleasures of his leisure hours, by the greater charm of home life, by prizes offered to his ambition, so that, even while his hand mechanically follows the movements of the machine, his mind may be active in other directions? As George Fox wrought out a new religion while he hammered soles on his lapstone, will our factory operatives ever employ their thoughts on the Darwinian theory, or the conservation of forces, amid the click of the shuttle or the clang of the forge? Can we teach them to use four hours of leisure so as to redeem and make profitable to soul and body the eight hours of toil? And what are the instruments for doing this? Are the school, the church, the lyceum, the theatre, all that is wanted? Can we make these sufficient to contend against the dangers of the tavern and the grog-shop?

These seem to me the questions which lie at the foundation of our efforts for the elevation of the workman, and to which neither education, association, nor co-operation appear yet to have given sufficient answer.

E. D. C.

FAITH.

In a recent visit to the West, it was our fortune to spend an evening with a man, an Englishman by birth, graduated by no university, but endowed by Nature with a good share of what is better than classics or college diplomas—common sense; which, according to Dr. Carpenter, is the best sense one can have, as it is the "coördination of the whole aggregate of our experiences."

It happened that the conversation turned to religious subjects, and among others discussed was "faith." Our friend, though a regular attendant at the Unitarian Church, declared that he had no "faith," and that he believed the word was in the last stages of consumption, and would soon pass away with the Christian theology and be consigned by science to the tomb of obsolete ideas. To him the word stood for a false, artificial, sickly state of mind. It meant apparently a complete self-surrender to another; a flinging yourself at the "foot of the cross" and losing yourself in Christ Jesus; a meek folding of the hands and passive waiting in ascension robes for the coming of the Lord and Savior to snatch his lambs from the cruel wolves of this cold and dreary world; an opening of the mouth, shutting of the eyes, and swallowing blindly whatever theological pills or soothing syrup the doctors of divinity and nurses of the Church might choose to administer. The thought made him sick of the word, and he eschewed it altogether. Many other people have done the same, and no wonder. This word faith has been so monopolized and perverted by the Church; has been so often used as the antonym of reason and converted into a pack-horse of ignorance and superstition, or paraded like a broad phylactery on the neck of hypocrisy, that one cannot wonder at the disposition to repudiate the word with the doctrines it has been associated with.

But the abuse of a word ought not to blind us to its proper significance and use. We believe that this little word faith should not be expunged from our vocabulary, simply because it has been very often prostituted to the service of superstition. We may re-baptize it or fumigate it, as the early Christians did their heathen temples before worshipping in them; then with renovated meaning it may yet do noble service to mankind. When such Tecumseh-like materialists as Dr. Buchner, who slays and scalps "both man and woman, infant and suckling" among his opponents, affirms his belief in the reality of a sentiment of "faith" in man, and declares that "even materialists have a faith," we may not be reproached with superstition, perhaps, if we accept the word. Therefore, without having any peculiar "faith in Jesus" or purpose to "stand up" ecclesiastically for him, we think we have as much genuine faith, in the essential meaning of that word, as many who pronounce us faithless infidels and atheists.

Faith, as we understand it, is not some peculiar possession of pale-faced Piety; not some supernatural mystery dropping down from heaven into the hearts of praying converts; not the monopoly or exclusive heritage of the Church; but the inalienable possession of every man born into the world; a natural faculty of the mind, no more religious nor mysterious in itself than the faculty of hope or love. What is faith but another name for reliance?

Faith in God is reliance on God; faith in others is reliance on others; faith in self is self-reliance.

Now no one, we think, will deny that believers in Free Religion generally have this faith in self. Indeed, we are reproached with having too much self-faith, or self-reliance. We are assured that we ought to have more faith in Jesus as "the way, the truth, and the life," instead of trusting to ourselves to find these things. It is exactly at this point that we differ from Christians: while they have more faith than we in Jesus, in his teachings and promises, we have more faith in our own powers to discover what truth is and where it is than they have. They have faith in the truth "as it is in Jesus;" we have faith in the truth as it is in ourselves. They trust the reason of Jesus, while we trust our own reason and conscience; and when they seem to lead us in a more excellent way and reveal to us higher truths than he saw or taught, we do not follow Jesus, but follow on after our own "flying ideal," as Emerson calls it. We acknowledge that we subject ourselves to the charge of "self-conceit;" and no doubt sometimes self-reliance may degenerate into self-conceit, just as "faith in Jesus" may degenerate into disgusting self-abasement. But we must run that risk. Self-reliance is not inconsistent with modesty, if it is not always coupled with it.

Faith in self, in the sphere of religious truth, is the distinguishing spirit between "Free Religionists" and "Christians." When Jesus differs from us, with due respect to him, we lose faith in his teaching. He stood up for himself, and we stand up for ourselves. We simply exercise in religion the same faith in self which all men exercise in other departments of inquiry. No one doubts that self-reliance is a necessary state of mind in investigating all other facts and principles; why should the realm of religious truths be an exception? Why not deify some geological Jesus, or some "savior" in every science, and surrender our faith in self to him, and forever after worship him as the "way, the truth, and the life" and the only name under heaven whereby men can be saved from error in that particular science? We do not do this, however much we may respect the opinions of scientists. They have weight with us, but we do not allow our faith in them to supplant faith in self, by which we mean the faith that we can see and judge for ourselves respecting the truth of what they assert. As we have no savior and redeemer in science, so we have none in religion, though we reverence the great teachers in both. We confess no one as "the way, the truth, and the life" in religion more than in physics or metaphysics. We have faith in our own powers to judge of the truth of the "Sermon on the Mount" and of the Epistles of Paul, as well as to judge of the truth of the epistles of Garrison to Sumner or the last "Lay Sermon" of Prof. Huxley.

At another time we shall speak of faith in its other manifestations. W. H. S.

PRAYER FOR TEMPORAL AND SPIRITUAL BLESSINGS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—Much discussion has been going on here lately on the subject of the "Efficacy of Prayer," which has led the majority of people, who do not think very deeply, to believe that this question involves the very existence of religion and the being of God.

Those who believe in the efficacy of prayer feel that if they lose that they lose all; and those who attack the doctrine, for the most part, do so with the conviction that, if that be overthrown, there will be nothing left but Comtism or Pantheism.

Now it is the object of this letter to show that both parties in this dispute are wrong. What is called the "Efficacy of Prayer" can be shown to be a delusion; and I think it can also be shown that another and far more reasonable view of prayer will take its place without any necessity for lapsing into irreligion or atheism.

By the term "efficacy of prayer" is usually understood the power of a believing and pious soul to obtain some benefit from God (chiefly of a temporal kind) which could not be otherwise obtained. It amounts, in short, to the power of man to change the Creator's will, to interfere as it were with the Divine purpose, and thus to modify the course of Providence.

The rudest examples of this belief are to be found in such stories as the Apostle James quotes in support of his assertion, "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much." Elijah the Tishbite praying first for a long drought and afterwards for rain, and God doing exactly as the Prophet desired, is an extreme case in point. In modern times the "Peculiar People," in admirable consistency of belief, implicitly follow the Apostle's instructions in cases of sickness. Unfortunately for their own faith, this foolish rule breaks down, and sick people die in spite of all the prayers for their recovery.

George Müller's Home for children is also a case which cannot be passed over in considering this subject. He says (and his word might be taken without scruple), that he has used no other means in the world to get money for his vast work of charity than that of simple prayer. It is true that he has advertised the success of his undertaking, and that may account in great measure for its continuance and increase; but that could not account for its rise and establishment in the first instance.

Any fact is too precious to be discarded; and I for one, though I am simply shocked at the presumption of a man challenging the special Providence of God on behalf of himself or others, and running the risk of a great calamity, still believe that "the Home," as George Müller states, is an answer to prayer.

But its entirely exceptional character prevents us from attempting to repeat the experiment, were there not many other grounds for not only denying the efficacy of prayer to change the will of God, but also for deprecating such a misuse of our trust in God as would lead us to dictate to him what to do.

There are an increasing number of really religious persons who never dream of asking God for a temporal benefit, and who, if, being pressed by some necessity for their dear relatives and friends, they should pour out a prayer for Divine help on their behalf, invariably close every such petition with a hearty ejaculation, "Not my will, but thine be done." We have got beyond the stage of reasoning whether prayer for temporal good can be answered or not. We simply think them wrong and unbelieving. We regard them as props of our own weakness and want of courage and want of confidence in God, rather than of faith in him and love of his perfect will. If God were really to entrust to us (ignorant as we are of what is best for us and our fellow-men) a power by which we could gain the satisfaction of our desires, he would be doing us infinite wrong, multiplying all his discipline of us, turning our energies into the wrong channel, and deliberately abdicating part of his rightful power as Ruler of the world and the Father of men. It would, in short, be a calamity to the soul far greater than the combined forces of Nature could inflict upon the body.

But still we pray! Yes, but for what? In a hundred different forms our prayer is but one; namely, to be made like unto what God wishes us to be. Whether we pray for wisdom, strength, tenderness of conscience, love of truth, and the thousand and one objects of the soul's aspiration, the prayer which underlies them all is simply for goodness of heart. And we believe such prayer to be efficacious both in its reflex action on our own souls, and also in preparing us to receive those influences which, in the very nature of things, we may reasonably expect from a Being who has first taught us to love and to draw near to himself. The fact of our faith and love toward God is as important and worthy of notice as the revolution of our earth from west to east. It cannot be explained away, and there is nothing in our spiritual experience so satisfying to this faith and love as communion with God in prayer and thanksgiving. It is as natural as the exercise of our bodily faculties; and so long as the idea of God remains as an object of affection and confidence, so long will man have the very instinct of prayer, although the more he loves and trusts in God the less he will feel inclined to ask for at his hands. Prayer will cease to be for temporal good, and be offered only for spiritual; while praise will become less and less an act of thanksgiving for bounty, and more and more an act of adoration of the higher glory of God which has been revealed to our souls.

Let not, then, the religious man be afraid to have the so-called "efficacy of prayer" taken from him. Let him willingly abandon the lower ground at the bidding of science and of a nobler faith, and learn to leave the Almighty to do his own work without our officious and childish interference. When we have more faith, we shall be able to say in every event of our life: "It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good."

On the other hand, let not the men of science imagine that, because they have dug out the worm at the root, they have also uprooted the tree. They have only done it good by letting in the air and by destroying the cankerous grubs. It will only take root afresh and bear more lovely and abundant fruit. Religion—trust and love towards God—is a tree of God's own planting in the soul of man, and no true science can ever be opposed to it, no ruthless shattering of idols can touch the Eternal One whose blessed likeness they have caricatured. I, for one, am ready to part with every human error and superstition which true science can wrench from me.

I am, sir, very faithfully yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE,
DULWICH, S. E., Oct. 1, 1872.

EDITORIAL BOOK NOTICES.

SIX OF ONE BY HALF A DOZEN OF THE OTHER, published by Roberts Brothers, is the singular title of a story of compound authorship, the writers being Harriet Beecher Stowe, Adeline D. T. Whitney, Lucretia P. Hale, Frederic W. Loring (who has since been unfortunately killed by outlaws near San Francisco), Frederic B. Perkins, and Edward E. Hale. The "Six of One" are the six heroes and heroines of the tale; the "Half a Dozen of the Other" are the six authors. The story was first published as a serial in Old and New. Sold by T. J. Brown, Toledo.

THE ENGLISH LIFE OF JESUS, by Thomas Scott, Esq., of England. Published by the author, and for sale by Scribner, Welford, and Armstrong, 654 Broadway New York. Price $2.00. Bishop Hinds says of this book: "I am glad to hear that you are preparing a new edition of the 'English Life of Jesus.' The publication will be just now very opportune; for in it are mooted some of the most important questions which are agitated in the great religious movement of the day. . . . If the book is to be published by subscription, I would beg you to put down my name for ten copies." Our subscribers may remember that Professor Newman stated in THE INDEX of June 22 that in its pages "the English reader may find the errors of the received Gospels and the falsehoods of the Fourth Gospel more fully exhibited, perhaps, than anywhere else hitherto." For the copy before us, we are indebted to the kindness of the author; but as frequent private inquiries have been addressed to us by our readers since the above notice by Professor Newman, concerning the price of the volume and the place where it can be obtained, we have given above the desired information. The present work is more than a new edition; it is substantially a new book, and deserves to be most widely read and circulated. In no easily accessible volume can be found a clearer, more acute, or more circumstantial analysis of the myths which early collected about the career of Jesus, and which have been, and still are, urged upon the sober credence of mankind as stamped with the seal of Divine inspiration. The famous "Life of Jesus" by Strauss, even in the popular edition, costs several times as much as Mr. Scott's compact treatise; but for the use of all but professed scholars the latter is equally good and more readable. The fascinating book by Renan is too much of a rhapsody, and too little trustworthy in a critical point of view, to answer the purpose of accurate instruction. Mr. Scott takes the Bible exactly as he finds it, compares it with itself, and, without going into learned disquisitions on Hebrew, Greek, and Syriac, shows the legendary character of the New Testament writings by their inherent incongruity. This is a needed work. The ordinary mind is impervious to subtle arguments based on unfamiliar premises, however true those may be; but it responds readily to a plain, direct, concise exhibition of intrinsic unreasonableness. With excellent judgment the London Examiner says: "The great merit of Mr. Scott's book is its common sense. Without irreverence he examines the four Gospels one by one, and compares them with one another, or with such other 'sacred records' as we possess, exactly as he would examine and compare other books purporting to be historically true; and it is hard to see how any reader, taking up the book with an honest desire to see whether any other views than those of conventional Orthodoxy are correct, can lay it down without a conviction that the conventional views are utterly untenable." Of a similar tenor are the criticisms of other British journals, as for instance the Scotsman of May 24, and the Glasgow Herald of May 31. The general character of the English Life of Jesus, it is true, is negative and destructive; but no one who is at all acquainted with the difficulties of the subject could expect any other treatment. Mr. Beecher, and the many other biographers of Jesus who assume the general authenticity of the gospel narratives, do so in the interest of feeling or faith, not of historic truth. That a large and noble life lay behind the vast accretion of fable that now hides it, we are more than inclined to believe; such stories do not cluster about the lives of mean or trivial men. But the tenacity of the evidence offered in support of the traditional conception of Jesus is of itself enough to satisfy a naturally sagacious mind that very little is or can be known about him. If Mr. Scott, therefore, does not construct, it is not his fault, construction being in this case apparently impossible. It remains to add that Mr. Scott is not only a strong and cogent writer himself, but also a most disinterested disseminator of the writings of other liberal thinkers, having for several years past devoted a large part of a moderate income to the publication in tract form of the best lectures, essays, and other papers of such men as Newman, Greg, Hinds, Neale, Robertson, Voysey, Conway, Strange, Kallach, Cranbrook, and so forth. These tracts are known all over England as exponents of the best, most earnest, and most cultivated religious thought of a liberal character; and careful examination of the many specimens with which we have been favored by the publisher satisfies us of the incalculable service he must have rendered to the liberal cause.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to errata.
N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

FUTURE LIFE.

The most popular argument in favor of the doctrine of a future life is that "the idea seems to be innate in the human mind." "It is the general belief of mankind and therefore must be true." "The fact that all men have always believed in this doctrine," say its advocates, "must be taken as strong presumptive evidence of its truthfulness."

In the first place the proposition is not true. All men have not believed in this doctrine. Indeed, there is no proof that the writers of the Old Testament scriptures believed in it. Lord Byron has the following in his preface to "Cain": "The reader will please bear in mind (what few choose to recollect) that there is no allusion to a future state in any of the books of Moses, nor indeed in the Old Testament. For a reason for this extraordinary omission, he may consult Warburton's Divine Legation; whether satisfying or not, no better has yet been assigned." Learned and good men in all countries and ages have expressed their doubts concerning this doctrine; even Paul acknowledges that the doctrine of the resurrection (which is the only Scriptural doctrine of a future life) was to the Greeks foolishness, and asserts that "not many learned men, not many wise men, not many noble," and so forth, "are called, for God has chosen the foolish things of this world to confound the things that are mighty." This is equivalent to admitting that none but the weak-minded, the ignorant, and the foolish accept the doctrine.

But, in the second place, if we admit for the sake of argument that all men have always believed this doctrine, how does that prove it? It generally occurred that the popular belief (which not founded upon positive knowledge) was true. If so, we may reason from analogy the truth of this doctrine also. Popular belief would once have proved that this earth was flat, in the same way. It would have proved, too, that the earth stood still, and that the heavenly bodies moved around it. It would have proved that the velocity of falling bodies would be in proportion to their weight. It would have proved that there could be no new continent to discover where we now live. Indeed, it does seem nearer the truth, that popular belief, when not founded upon positive knowledge, is generally wrong. On other subjects, at least, it has oftener been wrong than right; and therefore, reasoning from analogy, we should conclude that it was most likely to be wrong in this.

"If a man die, shall he live again?" has been a standing question for several thousands of years; and still it is an open question. "Do you believe in a future life?" Why should not every well informed man believe in a future life? They all believe in the rotundity of the earth—in the laws of gravitation—in the velocity of light, and in the general principles of chemistry, and of all the other natural sciences. Why do they not all believe in the doctrine of a future life? Have they tried harder to prove the former doctrines than the latter, or is the latter harder to prove than the former? The question, "Do you believe in a future life?" is equivalent to admitting that it is not and cannot be proved. And if it cannot be proved, why should we believe in it?

J. G. M.

"SPIRIT FACES."

ITHACA, N. Y.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—Will you allow me space for a reply to some remarks by Mr. James Emerson, in a late INDEX, upon the recognition of spirit faces? There is nothing new to me in the "phase" to which my attention is especially called. I am fully aware that many of the faces shown are more or less indistinct, and that some of them, partly from their position relatively to the observer, partly from the manner in which the light happens to fall upon them, and partly, I think, from less apparent causes, appear distinct to one person and indistinct to another. Neither have I any doubt that many excitable people, who are ready to be carried away by their feelings and wishes, imagine that they recognize faces, the identity of which, if they were calm and cautious, they would question.

For myself, when a spirit face is shown in circle, and I hear the exclamation, "It is my uncle!" or, "It is my wife!" I feel no assurance of the fact until further evidence is given; although, if there be no indistinctness, those who recognize it may be entirely justified in their certainty. No one doubts that, where the feelings are enlisted, persons not in the habit of questioning their impressions, or of patiently awaiting evidence on which to base their faith, allow themselves to feel quite sure of things which they ought rationally to regard as doubtful. And, apart from this, the various impressions which the same face may make upon the minds of different observers is remarkable to those who have noticed the fact. I have known persons, without any help from excited fancy, insist upon a resemblance between two individuals so strong as to lead them to mistake one for the other, where I could see no likeness whatever; but the knowledge of this exceptional possibility does not prevent my trusting my senses when I meet an acquaintance. If the faces of friends gone before were not, in some instances, so clearly shown as to render mistake impossible, there remain other tests as convincing as that of sight, sometimes occurring alone, and sometimes in conjunction with it.

I have heard (at Moravia) the spirit, when unable to show himself distinctly, call by name one of the strangers in the circle, giving his own, and sending messages to absent friends whose names also were spoken by him. In another case which I lately witnessed there, the hand of a young woman, whose face was watched for but not seen, was greatly to the surprise of her parents (who had just arrived from Cincinnati), thrust at arm's-length from the aperture, showing for identification two rings which had belonged to their daughter, one of which, a brilliant cross of diamonds, had been upon her finger when she passed away.

If the earnest longing to behold a familiar face, and the power in the medium to afford the emanations necessary to clothe it in form, were sufficient, as some have suggested, for its production, we should more frequently see those we vainly yearn to look upon instead of others that come to us uncalled and unexpected. At a late sitting in Moravia, where there were many in circle anxiously hoping to see friends and relatives, a young man appeared whom no one knew. After showing himself for a moment, he spoke, giving his name as "Freeman"—"Freeman Kelly." No one recognized the name or the face. He then spoke again, with apparent effort, saying, "I passed away in Ithaca;" and he added, in a low but very impressive voice, "Let all men know that this is true." On my return to Ithaca, I found on inquiry that a man bearing this name, and described as resembling the spirit we had seen, died last spring. He had promised some friends living in this place that, if he should go first, and if spirit returns were possible, he would come and testify to the fact. These friends were not present when he redeemed his promise, but received his communication through the lips of those who heard it.

I received myself, just before leaving Moravia, a message delivered by the controlling spirit (spoken in a loud voice and with marked distinctness) from a child unable to materialize his face, in which message a word was used that surprised me, and one that, if I had thought for hours of what he would be likely to say, I should never have anticipated, but which was startlingly significant as a test of identity. That word came from no mind in the circle.

Why spirits do not in returning give us information which it appears reasonable to expect from them, I cannot tell. I am, for my part, too thankful for what I have learned through them, and too conscious of my ignorance concerning the laws which control and limit the manifestations of their power and their love, to murmur or doubt because they fail to tell me much which I should like to know, or because I cannot understand why what it would seem most natural that they should speak of is withheld. Objectors say, "It is very strange that, if spirits really communicate at all, they do not tell us so-and-so;" and I say also, "Yes, it is very strange." It is all very strange; but apparent strangeness is only want of knowledge, and it would be far stranger if, knowing so little as we do, there were nothing inexplicable and seemingly inconsistent in the phenomena.

As to the mediums alluded to by Mr. Emerson: of Mr. Mansfield's powers I know, from experience, nothing favorable. I have seen appear upon the back of Charles Foster's hand the name of a little child, still living on this earth, and dearly loved by the son I had lost: in this case no "strong-minded spirit" was involved, and no clew, either by pointing at a letter or otherwise, had been given. This medium, to whom I was an utter stranger, also repeated to me, in the presence of Dr. Grey, of New York, the last words spoken to me by my dear boy before he was taken from me: which words had not been written, nor mentioned to any one in the city, where I had arrived only a day or two before.

As to Spiritualists losing their faith through observation of the phenomena, it may be that there have been such cases, though I have never known of any, while I do know of many whose experience has been the reverse of this, and whose interest and faith have grown even stronger and deeper through years of patient and critical investigation. Each one must seek truth for himself, using the powers and opportunities given him for examination and decision, not troubling himself because others have come to different conclusions, but working out the problem for himself, and standing firmly on his own feet, neither being staggered by, nor leaning for support upon, the opinions of those who in some things may be wiser than himself.

LOUISA ANDREWS.

A DEATH-BED PENITENT.

There lived at one time in Mobile a jovial Frenchman who had all his life been an avowed atheist. He was one of that class, now much smaller than formerly, who, in addition to the old stock arguments against Orthodox Christianity, indulged freely in coarse ridicule and abuse.

But sickness laid hold of him at last. Believing that his somewhat gay life was near its end, he found, as the conventional infidel of the tract always does, the creed he had lived by a poor one to die by, and came to look upon his past with something of remorse and his future with lively misgivings. So he sent for a worthy doctor of souls, whom he knew, to come to him.

The minister lost no time in getting to his bedside, and, rejoiced to find him repentant, comforted him with the customary words of hope and promise, beseeching him meanwhile to renounce his evil course and turn to the only way that would lead him to salvation.

"Oui, Monsieur: I wish to make some little apology. You know I have been make some ver free speech vid some of de ladies and gentlemen in de Bible."

Yes, Mr. Schaumburg was sorry to say that he had heard as much.

"Oui, I haf said many tings. But I haf lately some thoughts about dese subject—I don't know if I may haf been not altogether wrong. Yeez, sometimes I haf said dat de twelf apostles vaz all a pack of cowards,—dat dey runned away and leaf dere master ven he vas in trouble. Vell, yeez, dat is so! Dey deed all run. But deu may be dey vas not cowards. Dere vas only twelf of dem, and one hundred centurions! Now vat, I would ask you, could twelf men do against one hundred centurions? No-o-o, I do not tink dey vas exactly cowards."

Mr. Schaumburg shook his head deprecatingly.

"Vell, too, I haf make some ver not polite remarks about de lady-moder of Jesus—vich I don't tink vas right at all! I haf been tink dat offer a good deal, and I believe dat Joseph and Mary vas married before, eh? It may haf been a private marriage, you understan; such tings been often done, but I tink all de same dey vas married. And dat is not all. I haf call Jesus himself a tef, because he took a mule! Now you don't tink, Mr. Schaumburg, I ever really tought he stole dat mule? No-o-o! He borrow dat mule! I haf not de slightest doubt dat he haf de man's consent to take dat mule, and return heem ven he vas too vid heem. I never tink he vas a tef. You see, Mr. Schaumburg," continued the poor fellow, turning painfully in bed, "I feel dat I vant to make my excuse, my apology, to Jesus. I tink maybe I go to de gentleman's countree before ver long, and I should like, at least, to be on terms of civility vid him."

L.

TRUTH AND SENTIMENT.

Boston, June 15, 1872.

It seems to me that most of us are somewhat in the position of the English Bishop, whom Prof. Huxley so nobly rebuked some time since; that is, we believe what is agreeable, or cover ideas so much with the flowery clothing of sentiment that, if not utterly lost, one can scarcely find the truth. But searchers for the truth must manfully cast aside any peculiar form they would prefer to have it take, and accept it as it shall come.

I think there can be no greater desire of the human mind than to know the exact truth regarding its relation to the unchangeable laws of the moral and physical universe; or, as the Christian believer would state it, his relation to God or his Heavenly Father. The laws of Nature are unchangeable. We all know this. How? By experience. For instance, the mariner goes to sea, knowing in the majority of cases nothing of the great solar laws which control the movements of the heavenly bodies. But he knows the experience of ages has proved their unchangeableness. Hence, according to certain rules, he takes his altitudes, adds and subtracts as directed, and finds certain results; takes his chart, notes his position thereon as confidently as we take our daily rides or walks to any well-known place. The astronomer, of more elaborate education, sees a star disappear to-day, and, in accordance with certain laws which the thought and experience of ages have proved to be true, he makes calculations and predicts its appearance years or ages hence. The man dies, but time proves his prediction true.

Would these men be so sure except for their firm belief in the unchangeableness of the physical laws? Are not these laws as well the laws of God?

But the idea I wish to point more directly at is the unchangeableness also of the laws governing our mental and physical natures in the moral world. Are not these laws also unchangeable? To say they are not implies changeableness on the part of God. And yet every Christian believes in "forgiveness of sin," clothing his idea in the beautiful but to me false language of sentiment—that "his dear Heavenly Father looks down with pity on his children." If he is capable of the emotion of pity, then he must be of that of anger; for pity is but a feeling, a passion, and every passion or feeling has its opposite, thus implying a change in the being whom every Christian declares unchangeable.

For many months I have thought upon this matter, with all the power I have, and the belief that the ideas I have arrived at may lead others into more open freedom and self-dependence is my reason for making them public.

In the first place let us consider the phrase, "Our Father in heaven." Where? Above? No. Beneath? No—for the earth revolves and changes its position. Where then is this heaven? In the peace of the human soul—the oneness with infinite law!

But, to be more distinct, let us suppose a case. Here is one who has committed or is steadily committing sin both against the law of his body and his mind; he feels it, he wishes it were not so; he almost hates himself,—father, mother, wife, children, friends seem disagreeable to him; Nature no longer appears beautiful, the birds' songs no longer charm his ear, the glorious sun seems to shine only in mockery of his inward darkness; and yet he is a man, child of God or child of Nature, either or both. But a change comes; the man, pained and made unhappy by the war going on within him between passion and reason, resolves to conquer passion, puts all his powers at work, and finds forces in himself to help him that he knew not of. Now how sudden the change in all outward things! His friends again seem loving and kind; yet have they changed? Is it not more probable that, noticing the struggle going on in their friend, they have only become more tender and kind? So too with Nature: she seems to smile again, the songs of the birds are once more sweet, and the light of the sun glorifies all things to his eyes as before. But has Nature really changed? Do the birds sing more sweetly, or does the sun shine more brightly? Of course not; the change is in the man, not in Nature nor in God. God was as near to the sinner in his sin as in his true efforts for the right. Hence it seems to me this idea of forgiveness of sin is false to all truth, and stands in the way of our advancement to mental and moral strength and purity of character.

A word on this word God and I am done. As we look around, within, and about us, we find a something to which every effect is traceable: we know it is; it has no form, yet is everywhere; hence it must be spirit. The Christian calls it God, Creator, Heavenly Father. Scientists call it power, force, first cause. And yet all mean the same thing. Whatever it is, it is the great inspirer of our hopes, our works. We see it in man, bird, and beast; in things material and things immaterial. Hence our connection with all—no separation; all one; each part necessary to the perfect Whole. Can anything be more grand! Let us so live as to be worthy of such connection.

FRANK S. BILLINGS.

"BABES AND SUCKLINGS."

In my own circle the following things have just been said by children of four and six years old:—

Bertie came in yesterday in a state of excitement. A boy in the street told him that there were ghosts in the church-yard on "our corner." Bertie almost saw two or three. I told him there were no ghosts anywhere. He was satisfied for a minute or two, and got part way down stairs to go out again; but he turned back, and in an indescribable tone of voice said, "You forget the Holy Ghost, mamma; what's that?"

Little Elliott (four years old), who is partly under the care of a lady of Methodist faith, and has heard much of Jesus, I suppose, said to his mother the other day, "Mamma, isn't God as great as Jesus?" His mother explained to him that God was the great controlling power. He then said: "Well, I am going to give up Jesus, and go for God after this."

A QUERY.

CINCINNATI, O., Oct. 11, 1872.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—I think your space and time can be better occupied than in discussing "Masonic atheism;" therefore I have no desire to occupy either with many remarks,—in fact, would rather not occupy your space at all. But your correspondent "G." in this week's INDEX says: "The grand basis of Masonry is the Holy Bible," etc. He then says: "The time may come, however, when these eccrescences will be removed."

I only want to ask: Is the grand basis an eccrescence? Yours truly, A. BATE.

SUNDAY ITEMS.

A Boston woman, who has been reading in the papers that Sunday marriages are illegal, writes to the papers to know how it is with a baby born on a Sunday. If so, which should be punished, the father, the mother, or the baby?

Topeka, Kansas, has fined a barber five cents for shaving a customer on Sunday.

Friends of the Index!

Please send us immediately the name and address of every Radical Bookseller and Newsmen you may know of; also the address of every editor and paper likely to give aid and comfort to our enterprise; and oblige ASA B. BUTTS, General Agent of THE INDEX.

Address THE INDEX, DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE RADICAL.

A few odd volumes, bound in cloth, for sale at two dollars ($2) per vol. Sent post paid.
Address SYDNEY H. MORSE,
25 Brounfield St., Boston, Mass.

HORACE GREELEY! ULYSSES S. GRANT!

FINE MEDALLIONS OF THE TWO PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES.

These medallions are nicely finished in oil (so that they may always be kept clean) and hand-colored. Price, $3.00 each. Sent, express paid, on receipt of price.
Address S. H. MORSE,
Box 5021, Boston, Mass.

"The form and material of this counterfeit presentation are such as to fit it for the parlor and library walls; to be kept as a memorial of one who is so highly honored from his close identification with the nation's fears, hopes, and triumphs in the great crisis of its history. The manipulation of this work is artistic and satisfactory."—Boston Transcript. [148]

MONKS, POPES, And their Political Intrigues.

BY JOHN ALBERGER. 1 Vol., 12mo; pp. 385. Price $1.50.

AGENTS FOR SUPPLYING THE TRADE.—Lee & Shepard, Boston; Lee, Shepard, & Dillingham, New York; Ma-on, Baker, & Pratt, New York; J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia; Claxton, Remson, & Fiaffeldinger, Philadelphia; and for sale by booksellers generally. [148]

G. L. HENDERSON & CO., BANKERS, LEROY, MINN.

Money loaned on short time, or for a term of years, on unimproved improved farms, at 12 per cent. per annum, net, interest payable annually. All expense for abstract of title and recording mortgage paid by borrower.

We are frequently asked for loans by parties living in other States, but we make loans only to parties living near us in Iowa or Minnesota, where we can examine personally the lands offered as security. The security must be worth two or three times as much as the sum loaned. We can let sums to good farmers who wish to improve their lands, ranging from $200 to $2,000. At the end of each year we collect the interest and remit free of charge to parties who send us money for investment.

Parties who may have money in Savings Banks, and who do not want the money for one, two, or three years, can thus realize a good rate on their money, and there is no class of security that can be any safer.

To parties wishing to place money in our hands for investment, we give the following references and correspondents: City National Bank, Chicago, Ill.

Samuel Merrill, President People's National Bank, Des Moines, Iowa.

F. R. Graves, President of First National Bank, McGregor, Iowa, and of C. D. & M. R. R., Duquoin, Iowa.

Gilchrist & Co., McGregor, Iowa.

Hon. E. H. Williams, Clermont, Iowa.

We buy and sell drafts on any part of the United States or Europe.

Parties addressing us will please state in what paper they read our advertisement. [148]

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1872, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, Wm. J. Potter, New Bedford, Mass. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA;" by C. D. B. Miller, on the question, "Does RELIGION REPRESENT A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A FIRMABLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "The Religion of Humanity;" together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucretia Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Seaver, Alexander Leos, and others. Price, 35 cents; in packages of five or more, 25 cents each.

The ANNUAL REPORTS for 1868, 1869, 1870, and 1871 (at 25 cents each), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "The Worship of Jesus" (50 cents), Rev. W. H. Channing's essay on "The Religion of China" (20 cents), Col. T. W. Higginson's essay on "The Sympathy of Religions" (50 cents), and an essay by W. J. Potter, on "Reason and Revelation" (10 cents)—all published through the Association—can also be obtained as above.

[144-147]

WM. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy, PUBLISHED QUARTERLY IN ST. LOUIS, MO.

It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of Speculative Philosophy in all its departments.

Terms of Subscription.

Two dollars per volume; single number, 50 cents. Vols. I. and II., bound in one volume in muslin, will be sent post-paid by mail for $3.00. Vol. III., Vol. IV., and Vol. V. in muslin, $3.00 each.

All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor,

WM. T. HARRIS,

110-181eow.

Box 2808, St. Louis, Mo.

IMPORTANT AND SCHOLARLY WORKS.

FOR SALE BY

Scribner, Welford, & Armstrong, 654 Broadway, New York.

1. TYLOR'S RESEARCHES INTO THE EARLY HISTORY OF MANKIND. 1 Vol., 8vo. $6.00
2. TYLOR'S PRIMITIVE CULTURE: RESEARCHES INTO THE DEVELOPMENT OF MYTHOLOGY, PHILOSOPHY, RELIGION, ART, & CUSTOM. 2 Vols., 8vo. $12.00
3. MAURICE'S MORAL AND METAPHYSICAL PHILOSOPHY. New and revised edition. 2 very large Vols., 8vo. $9.00
4. UEBERWEG'S SYSTEM OF LOGIC AND HISTORY OF LOGICAL DOCTRINES. Large 8vo. $8.00
5. HEAL'S CATENA OF BUDDHIST SCRIPTURES, from the Chinese. 1 Vol., 8vo. $7.50
6. ALABASTER'S THE WHEEL OF THE LAW. BUDDHISM ILLUSTRATED FROM NIAHSE AND OTHER SOURCES. 1 Vol., 8vo. $7.00
7. MAHAPPA'S PROLEGOMENA TO ANCIENT HISTORY.—CONTAINING THE INTERPRETATION OF LEONARDS AND INSCRIPTIONS, AND A SURVEY OF OLD EGYPTIAN LITERATURE. 1 Vol., 8vo. $7.00
8. RIG-VEDA.—SANSKRIT: THE SACRED HYMNS OF THE BRAHMANAS. Translated and explained by MAX MUELLER. 1 Vol., 8vo. $6.25
9. THOMSON'S THE DISCOVERY OF A NEW WORLD OF BEING. 1 Vol., 12mo. $3.00
10. AVESTA: THE RELIGIOUS BOOKS OF THE FAIRMERS. Translated by BLECK. 1 Vol., 8vo. $10.50
11. SPINOZA, HIS LIFE, CORRESPONDENCE, AND ETHICS. By DR. WILLIS. 1 large Vol., 8vo. $9.00
12. ZERFF'S SPIRITUALISM AND ANIMAL MAGNETISM. 1 Vol., 12mo. $1.25
13. COBBE'S DARWINISM IN MORALS, AND OTHER ESSAYS. 1 Vol., 8vo. $5.00
14. HEADLEY'S "WHAT IS TRUTH?" ELEMENTARY AND PRIMARY VIEWS OF RELIGION. 1 Vol., 12mo. $1.25
15. JACCOLIOT'S THE BIBLE IN INDIA. HINDU ORIGIN OF HEBREW AND CHRISTIAN REVELATION. 1 Vol., 8vo. $2.50
16. STIRLING'S THE SECRET OF HEGEL: BEING THE HEGELIAN SYSTEM IN ORIGIN, PRINCIPLE, FORM, AND MATTER. 2 Vols., 8vo. $14.00
17. GREG'S LITERARY AND SOCIAL JUDGMENTS. New and cheap edition. 1 Vol., 12mo. $2.50
18. GREG'S CREED OF CHRISTENDOM.—ITS FOUNDATIONS AND SUPERSTRUCTURE. 1 Vol., 12mo. $3.00
19. CRANBROOK'S THE FOUNDERS OF CHRISTIANITY: OR DISCOURSES ON THE ORIGIN OF CHRISTIANITY. 1 Vol., 16mo. $3.00
20. HENNEL'S INQUIRY CONCERNING THE ORIGIN OF CHRISTIANITY. 1 Vol., 12mo. $1.25
21. HENNEL'S COMPARATIVISM: AN INTRODUCTION TO "PRESENT RELIGION." 1 Vol., 12mo. $1.25
22. VOYSEY'S THE SLING AND THE STONE. Liberal Sermons. Vols. III. & IV. in 12mo each. $3.75
23. VOYSEY'S DEFENCE ON CHARGES OF HERESY. .50
24. FEUERBACH'S ESSENCE OF CHRISTIANITY. Translated by EVANS. 1 Vol., 12mo. $3.00
25. BUECHNER'S FORCE AND MATTER: EMPIRICAL-PHILOSOPHICAL STUDIES, INTELLIGIBLY RENDERED. 1 Vol., 12mo. $3.75
26. NUTTON'S FAITH AND SCIENCE. 1 Vol., 12mo. $4.50
27. COBBE'S HOURS OF WORK AND PLAY. 12mo. $3.00
28. JESUS THE MESSIAH. 1 Vol., 12mo. $5.25
29. THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF SATAN. By Doctor BEARD. 1 Vol., 12mo. $3.75
30. SCOTT'S (THOMAS) THE ENGLISH LIFE OF JESUS. Second Edition, re-written. 1 Vol., 12mo. $2.00
31. BRAITHWAITE'S ESSE AND POSSE. A COMPARISON OF DIVINE, RY-NUAL LAWS AND POWERS, AS SEVERALLY INDICATED IN FACT, FAITH, AND RECORD. 12mo. $5.25
32. EDMUND'S TRACES OF HISTORY IN THE NAMES OF PLACES. New edition. 1 Vol., 12mo. $3.50
33. JOURNAL OF SPECULATIVE PHILOSOPHY. Published in St. Louis. 5 Vols. In 4. $14.00
34. COMTE'S POSITIVE PHILOSOPHY. Translated by HARRIET MARTINEAU. 2 Vols. $3.00
35. BRIDGES' UNITY OF COMTE'S LIFE AND DOCTRINE. 8vo, paper. $1.25
36. COMTE'S CATECHISM OF POSITIVISM. Translated by CONGREVE. 1 Vol., 12mo. $3.25
37. HARDY'S MANUAL OF BUDDHISM. 1 Vol., 8vo. $6.00
38. HARDY'S ORIGIN OF EASTERN MONACHISM. $3.75
39. NEALE'S ANALOGY OF THOUGHT AND NATURE. $3.75
40. HARRISON'S MEANING OF HISTORY. 50
41. ESSAY ON TREE AND SERPENT WORSHIP. 25
42. NEWMAN'S THE BIGOT AND THE SKEPTIC. 25
43. MARTINEAU'S NEW AFFINITIES OF FAITH. 30
44. HIND'S FREE DISCUSSION OF RELIGIOUS TOPICS. 50
45. JEWISH LITERATURE AND MODERN EDUCATION. 75
46. NEWMAN'S CAUSES OF ATHEISM. 25
47. CRANBROOK'S CREDIBILITY: OR, DISCOURSES ON QUESTIONS OF CHRISTIAN FAITH. 1 Vol., 12mo. $1.75
48. THORNDALE: ON THE CONFLICT OF OPINIONS. $3.00
49. CHAILLIS' CREATION IN PLAN AND IN PROGRESS. $2.00
50. COLERIDGE'S HINTS ON THE THEORY OF LIFE. $2.50
51. SCOTT'S INTELLECTUAL CHARACTER OF THE FIRST CAUSE. $1.25

FOR SALE BY

Scribner, Welford, & Armstrong, 654 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Mailed to any address on receipt of price.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 142 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 22 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of New York, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Weston super Mare, Eng.
Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.

ASA B. BUTTS is Advertising and General Agent for the Index Association. All letters to him on business matters should be addressed to "THE INDEX, Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio."

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription. Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial.

Address

THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

New Tracts!

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition.

FIRST SERIES.....No. 1 to No. 10
SECOND SERIES.....No. 11 to No. 20

Each Series, 30 Cents; Both, 50 Cents.

Address
[23-38]

CHAS. E. WHIPPLE,
19 PINEKEY ST., BOSTON.

GIVEN AWAY

TO ANY BOOK AGENT,

A $5.00 GREENBACK AND A SPECIMEN OF THE GREAT INDUSTRIES OF THE UNITED STATES.

1300 PAGES AND 500 ENGRAVINGS

PRINTED IN ENGLISH AND GERMAN.

Written by 20 Eminent Authors, including Horace Greeley and John B. Gough.

We want Agents in every town to solicit orders for this work, on liberal terms. It sells to all classes, and no library should be without it. It is a complete history of all branches of industry, processes of manufactures, etc. No like work ever before published. One agent sold 135 in eight days, and other 75 in two weeks. An early application will secure a choice in territory. Full particulars and terms will be sent free, with a specimen of this Great Work, and a $5 Greenback.

J. B. BURR & HYDE, Hartford, Conn.

[126-151.]

HALL'S MAGIC SHADE FIXTURES!

An ingenious arrangement by which a Shade may be rolled down from the top, or raised from the bottom of the Window, or both, as may be desired; thus securing PERFECT VENTILATION, GOOD LIGHT, and at the same time COMPLETE PRIVACY in the room.

They are an admirable and cheap substitute for Inside Blinds.

Are easily attached to Shades now in use. Are especially adapted for Office and Store Windows.

For sale by dealers in shades generally.

MANUFACTURED BY THE

CHICAGO CURTAIN FIXTURE COMPANY.

101 WEST LAKE ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

[137-147]

F. J. SCOTT,

J. H. STOPPLET,

ARCHITECTS,

73 MADISON STREET (Near Boody House), TOLEDO.
[130-141]

DAVID G. FRANCIS,

DEALER IN

NEW AND OLD BOOKS,

17 Astor Place, and 140 6th St., New York.

Priced catalogues of books in stock, issued from time to time, will be forwarded free to any address.
[147-149]

5 to $20 per day. Agents wanted! All classes of working people, from the young and old, make more money at work for a day, or a month, or all the time than at any other time. Particulars free. Address G. H. H. & Co., Portland, Maine.

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 2, 1872.

WHOLE No. 149.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
ABRAHAM WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.

OSWALD BROOKS BROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, ROY. CHARLES VOYSEY (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), Rev. MONTEGUE D. CORWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

(For THE INDEX.)

On Pain and Moral Evil.---II.

A SERMON PREACHED IN ST. GEORGE'S HALL, LONDON, DECEMBER 17, 1871.

BY THE REV. CHAS. VOYSEY.

"He doth not afflict with grief, nor grieve the children of men."--LAMENTATIONS, III. 33.

It is a duty incumbent on all those who firmly believe certain propositions, and who at the same time find by experience that their belief is beneficial, to do all in their power to make known their convictions and to induce the people to embrace them. So universally is this duty recognized that it is obeyed instinctively by the votaries of every creed and by the disciples of every school of thought. Even those whose boast it is that they believe nothing, or that nothing is of any consequence, are not slow to impress their enthusiasm of indifference on the attention of their friends and associates. No one, therefore, will find fault with us on rational grounds for endeavoring to impart our own belief to others and for doing our best to meet and answer the objections which may be urged against it. Indeed, it is emphatically our privilege as well as our characteristic duty, not to evade a single argument brought to the overthrow of our opinions; but to give every possible objection a fair and patient hearing and to weigh well its force before we dismiss it as invalid.

I have set myself a task which I know at the outset is beyond my powers, and which perhaps a wiser or more cautious advocate would have prudently shirked: it is to meet the objection against the existence of a perfectly good God which may be drawn from the facts of sin and suffering. The objection presented under various forms amounts to this in plain language: "There is not a perfectly good God presiding over this world, because the world is full of sin and suffering. How can you reconcile," we are asked, "the presence of sin or suffering at all with the supreme sovereignty of a perfectly good God?"

I take up this challenge with the deliberate conviction that I cannot to the entire satisfaction of any one answer such a question, or solve a difficulty which has perplexed the minds, hearts, and consciences of some of the world's noblest and wisest men. All that I can hope to accomplish is to furnish some grounds for believing that both sin and suffering subserve a purpose of lasting good, which they are designed to effect, and to show that it is quite as reasonable (or perhaps more so) to regard the presence of sin and suffering as direct indications of perfect moral order in the universe, as to regard them in the light of blemishes and defects. It will, of course, be somewhat difficult to keep the two divisions of our subject, sin and suffering, entirely separate; but as far as possible I will deal with only one at a time, and this morning ask you to follow me in the inquiry: "Is physical suffering an insurmountable objection to our belief in the existence and control of a perfectly good God?" Our present inquiry must be still further limited to the physical sufferings endured by mankind. We do not ignore those of the lower animals; we only postpone the consideration of their case that we may dwell upon those sufferings which we know more about. If anything favorable can be drawn from an examination of the sufferings of humanity, it will go far to prepare us for a similar conclusion in the case of the rest of creation.

My first reflection on the subject of human sufferings is that the quantity and the severity of them have been enormously exaggerated by human thought and speech. The only pain in the world of men and women and children is each person's own pain. The multiplication of individuals suffering pain does not really increase the quantity of pain beyond the exact amount borne by each individual. When pain is spoken of in the abstract for the convenience of language, remember it ceases to be pain. Only in one way can pain be increased by numbers of sufferers--by sympathy. That is, it adds to the pain which I already feel to know that A, B, C, are suffering likewise or worse. But the only real pain, I affirm, is what I, or A, B, or C, suffer from all sources whatever, whether from disease of our own or from sympathy with others. The pain of A, B, or C respectively, like my own, stands alone; you must add our pains together, for my pain is neither A's, nor B's, nor C's, nor can the pain which one individual suffers be transferred to another. The mere fact that there are and have been millions on millions of sufferers in the world does not really multiply the amount of suffering, because each individual bears his own suffering and cannot bear that of any one else. Granting, for the sake of argument, that some persons suffer much more pain than others do, some one person must have suffered the greatest amount of the acutest pain, and that person's pain constitutes by itself the sum total of the objector's charge against Almighty goodness, so far as the quantity and degree are concerned.

The Creator, confronted with this most suffering individual of all mankind, might justly say: "This man has suffered all that he could suffer from within, and all that he could suffer from sympathy with the pains of others: he has had to bear his own burden alone, and only that. The pains felt by a whole world beside could not add the weight of a hair to his own personal pain." We must, then, protest against the assumption that the numbers of sufferers at all adds to the charge against God's goodness. We have said our worst against the beneficence of his rule when we have presented the case of the one human being who has suffered most. He may be chargeable on other grounds for having made more than one person suffer at all--for having made not only two or three, but thousands of generations of sufferers; but what I urge is that we cannot make that into an accusation of having multiplied the quantity of pain. And if pain can be justified in the case of a single sufferer, it will go far to justify it in the case of countless generations of sufferers likewise. It is very common to hear people complain that God leaves thousands and thousands of people to die of hunger and disease. Statistics are always being quoted to show that God is unmerciful of the sufferings of men; and any great calamity which destroys or renders miserable a great many individuals is looked upon with greater suspicion and muffled rebellion, because of the numbers of people involved, than in one isolated case of very acute suffering. Now is it really an aggravation of human pain to have it fall simultaneously on a great number of individuals, or does it make no difference as to the quantity of pain borne by each one? If anything, I believe it mitigates the suffering to fall in this way on many persons at once. But what I want to make clear is that the mere fact of many hundreds suffering at once from the same calamity does not increase the actual quantity of the pain endured by each individual. You cannot, as I said, add up the pains of several individuals as you can add up the number of their heads and hands.

Then, as to the severity of physical pain, it is enormously exaggerated in the average mind. That there are pains which are maddening, and brain disorders which can only be likened unto the torments of the Inferno, are facts beyond dispute; but, when compared with the average of mankind, the instances of this very acute torture are extremely rare, and form quite an exception to the rule. On the whole, it is nearer the truth to say that pain is not so bad as one fears it to be; that it is generally bearable; and that the human frame actually grows accustomed to physical suffering.

The exceptional cases of its severity must be treated separately. We only want now to clear our minds of those exaggerations, both as to the quantity and the severity of the pain, which aggravate the charge brought against the Creator for allowing pain in this world at all.

I will now direct your attention to the most plain and palpable of the immediate effects of physical suffering upon the race of mankind. The most prominent of these is that it rouses opposition. Pain is no sooner felt than we put forth every effort to be rid of it. When we hear of the sufferings of others, the instinct of rebellion against pain is so strong that we are generally moved to do all in our power to help the sufferer; and if we know it to be beyond our power to remove or to alleviate, we try to harden our feelings by a mental effort, or to drive the subject altogether from our thoughts.

Nothing is more certain about pain than that we are constructed on purpose to fight against it, to do all in our power to avoid it, and when it is unavoidable, to weaken its severity,--when incurable, to become hardened to its effects. From this we gather that it is the Creator's will that we should never suffer more than we can possibly help; that one of the great ends of our being is to contend with, and, if possible, to annihilate physical suffering, to rid the world of it as soon as we can.

But what follows from this rebellion against suffering? Why, we owe everything that we have done, and all that we are, to the battle between humanity and physical pain. It has made us restless and inquiring; all our knowledge has sprung out of our pain, just as every man amongst us owes his life to-day to the pains of hunger which he felt when an infant. Pain has been man's intellectual as well as physical and moral schoolmaster. Had it not been for pain, and the restless desire to prevent or to cure it, there would have been no cultivation of the mind, no discoveries of stored-up treasure, no reading of the wonderful works of Nature which are spread out before us. Our inevitable sufferings have been a perpetual stimulus of our minds to knowledge, of our hands to skill, of our social instincts to civilization. In order to secure this contest with its consequences, of course pain must be painful: "No chastening seemeth for the present to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless afterwards"--I leave you to finish the text according to your own aspirations. All I feel is that, if suffering were not felt to be the evil thing it is called, we should not fight against it and try to conquer it as we do; and we cannot wonder if we find the instinct of rebellion against it, which the Creator himself has put into our natures, leading us now and then into extremes of resentment and even of murmuring against his method of training and discipline.

Another of the most palpable effects of suffering is the cultivation of our sympathies. If a "fellow-feeling makes us wondrous kind," and suffering, like "one touch of Nature," "makes the whole world kin," surely that baptism by fire is the most exalted consecration by which we could be admitted into the fold of God. It is true, and men may prove it for themselves, that a long continuance of physical comfort has a tendency to close the avenues of our affection, and to narrow the channels of our heart's love, unless a very noble spirit directs the will and affections. Those who suffer constantly and intensely, especially those who suffer extreme poverty, are more brotherly and tender to each other than we could have dreamed of. Can you imagine a poor, half-starved family entreating the messengers of mercy to go first to a poorer neighbor before they would accept relief themselves? But this is what I have heard with my own ears. Can you imagine those who have only two blankets in all the house lending one to a neighbor in sickness who had none at all? But this is what I have seen. Can you imagine a poor woman, enfeebled by disease and hardly able to stand, acting as monthly nurse to women still poorer than herself, and all for love, till she fell down and died? But this, too, is what I have seen. Travel abroad, and you will find that common danger and common suffering make warm-hearted brothers of those who, at home and in prosperity, would not even exchange a friendly greeting. But I need not enlarge on what is becoming now so well known, that one of the immediate results of physical suffering is to make the heart tender and to fill it with sympathy.

Scarcely second to this tremendous gain is the cultivation of our own fortitude, powers of endurance, and manly effort to be patient under acute pain. Without pain there would be no courage; nothing to brave. Without pain there would be no patience; nothing to bear. Without pain there would be no aspiration; nothing to disturb the hum-drum monotony of physical ease. Pleasure itself would lose half its zest were there no pain. And so it does not surprise us that fresh kinds of suffering rise to take the place of those which have disappeared. The struggle for existence, for instance, has taken quite new forms in the present epoch, and has to be fought out with a new generation of foes. As fast as one point of progress is reached, new demands are made upon our activity; fresh obstacles stand in our path to stimulate renewed efforts after the goal. If, then, we find that all our intellectual and moral progress is directly traceable to the rebellion against pain implanted in our nature, it will not be hard to recognize a wisdom higher than our own in the appointment of the suffering condition of humanity.

Still, there are those who object that beneficial results do not always flow from the infliction of pain. It must be admitted that sometimes pain and sorrow produce at first the reverse of those virtues which could not have birth without suffering. Great agony will sometimes produce cowardice, frenzy, hardness, and cruelty. The same appalling catastrophe will enoble some and debase others; make some brave, others craven, some generous, others selfish. These apparent anomalies are to be partially explained by the fact that what will do a man good at one stage of his progress is fatal at another; what exasperates him at one stage will at another raise and subdue him. It is contrary, however, to all analogy, that we should be able satisfactorily to account for anomalies and exceptions to the general order of Divine Providence. Our faculties and our experience are at present too limited to enable us to make a perfect induction, and we can but aim at a general view which is sound and reasonable so far as it goes.

Others have objected that God might have done all the good he intends for man without the pain and suffering; and that, if he could not have done so, he is not almighty. To this objection one can only reply that, in the order of Nature, there are already many things which cannot be done. A body cannot have at one and the same time the shape of a sphere and of a cube. No one thing can be in two places at once; and so forth. God himself cannot undo any already accomplished fact. He may twist and turn its consequences as he pleases, but he cannot alter the course of events which have already taken place. I think it almost burdens on childishness to substitute the suggestions of our confessed ignorance for the actual arrangements of a Providence whose wisdom in other matters we unhesitatingly adore.

Compared with the advantages to be derived from pain in this life only, a suffering condition is not an unfair price to pay for them; and if, as we devoutly hope, those advantages will grow greater to all eternity, we may well say with the Apostle: "I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us." "Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh in us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." To the ordinary essayist on pain, pain seems to be, and is spoken of, as if it were incessant and eternal. But as a matter of fact, few men and women suffer all through their lives without cessation, and even then death sets them free. Instead of being eternal, pain is begun and ended in every case within the short space of one hundred years. The worst and most excruciating and most incessant physical torture never exceeded that limit of duration; and what is that to eternity? The infant crying for its first meal suffers far longer, during these few minutes, in proportion to its subsequent life on earth, than men and women suffer in their whole lives in proportion to the life of the world to come.

But whichever way we look at physical suffering, we can only come to the conclusion of my text; namely, that if a perfectly good God is the author and ruler of our lives and conditions, it may in a certain sense be said truly of him: "He doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men." That is, not one grain of pain or sorrow is inflicted wantonly, or without a good purpose, but only from the necessity of things; and, judging by our own tenderness of heart, we may be quite sure that he would not put upon us the slightest affliction which was unnecessary to our eternal welfare. There is much pain in the world, perhaps by far the largest share of it, which is manifestly necessary to our own physical safety, without which, so senseless and ignorant is man, thousands would fall victims to the untamed forces of Nature. Such pain is a manifest blessing; but it has not been chiefly present to my mind in this discourse. I have been thinking much more of those pains and sorrows which seem to be purposeless, and which no forethought of ours could avert. Avoidable suffering is always the result of so much sin, a guilty neglect of God's known laws for which there is no excuse. But unavoidable suffering—suffering which is practically unavoidable through our own ignorance, or through the tyranny of others to-day—ought very soon to become avoidable,—ought gradually to pass over into the category of man's conquered foes, never to rise again to his dismay. But, while it is for us unavoidable, it will not paralyze our efforts to overcome and cast it out, to believe all the possible good purposes which our Maker had in view in bringing us face to face with a misery too terrible for our imperfect powers of resistance. It will even fortify our hearts to believe that, though God's hand has ordained every pain that we can bear, yet he never wishes us to bear a single pain which we can conquer or avoid, and that the direct use of pain in human discipline is to call forth that vigorous rebellion against it which will end ultimately in its complete removal. If pain did nothing more for us than to fill us with a burning sympathy which not only made us scrupulously careful not to inflict pain on others, but also to do all we possibly could to relieve and remedy the suffering around us, we might well bless the Lord God on high for his mercy to men, and say with hearts full of faith and adoration, with eyes open to every fact of human circumstance, with minds enlightened by the deepest and most careful reflection: "It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good."

SCIENCE AND HUMAN BROTHERHOOD.

[From the New York Nation.]

Huxley, in one of his "lay sermons," devoted to showing the influence of the growth of natural knowledge in improving the moral and physical condition of the race, supposes the first president of the Royal Society of London, which was founded just after the great fire of 1666, to revisit the earth once more, and pictures his surprise on learning that although London contains tenfold more inflammable matter than it did in his day, the rooms being filled with woodwork and light drapery, and every corner of the streets and houses with explosive and inflammable gases, it had never since then been burnt down, and that, owing to the invention of engines for throwing water, not even a street is ever destroyed by fire. This sermon was delivered in 1866. If Lord Brouncker had delayed his visit, however, five years, he would perhaps have found in the burning of Chicago some reason for doubting whether natural knowledge had done for the world all that the learned professor claims for it, either in the matter of preventing great conflagrations or of mitigating their consequences. For the growth of natural knowledge has had a double set of effects on human society. There is no question as to the enormous increase of comfort and security which it has wrought, and as to the influence it has had, through this comfort and security, in "altering our modes of thinking and our views of right and wrong." But it has enormously increased the area over which any great calamity is felt, at the same time that it has increased the area from which succor and sympathy are drawn.

A more striking example of this could not be desired than is furnished by the burning of Chicago. Chicago is, perhaps, more distinctively and peculiarly than any city which exists or has ever existed, the product of "the growth of natural knowledge." All other great cities, whether of the New or Old World, have had their foundations laid by accident, and have owed their rise to slow accretions of population, brought to them in the course of ages by all sorts of agencies, political, social, and commercial. Wars, famines, invasions, revolutions, the aimless wanderings of exiles and malcontents, the flight of criminals, the fears or necessities of sailors, the needs of barbarous tribes, or the flow of great rivers and the temptation of rich soil, have combined to build up nearly all of them in the slow course of centuries. This may be said with more or less accuracy of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and New Orleans, and Cincinnati, even, as well as of Rome, London, Paris, Berlin, Vienna, Venice, and Constantinople. Chicago, however, owes nothing, or next to nothing, to the past, and has no roots in human traditions or weaknesses. It is distinctly the product of steam travelling and electrical communication, and is the work of a single generation. It was created for the express purpose of receiving and distributing the products of the Northwest, and was run up like a warehouse or factory. Without the railroad and telegraph it could not have been created, or, if it had been created, it would have been of no use. Its very existence, under all the circumstances, would probably surprise Lord Brouncker far more than the immunity of London from great fires. The invention of the fire-engine is no doubt a great thing, but the creation of a city nearly as large as London at the time of the great fire, in the middle of a remote wilderness, within a period of forty years, is a far greater thing, even from the merely scientific point of view.

But, then, there is something about it even more wonderful than its creation, and illustrating still more remarkably the influence of scientific progress on human society. London, in Lord Brouncker's day, though a great political and commercial capital, had little or no relations except through what we should call a feeble and straggling commerce with the rest of the world. Had Chicago existed and been burnt down in his time, the news would have reached England probably in six or eight months, by means of brief allusions in commercial or other private letters, and would have been talked of as we talk of the sack of Rome by Alaric, or the storming of Constantinople by the Turks. It would have taken two months to get to New York or Boston, and the most charitably disposed man in either city would have speedily dismissed from his mind the little he knew about the calamity. Relief in the shape of stores he could not send for want of transportation, and, long before relief in money could get there, the sufferers would either be past help or able to do without it; and so he would have jogged on his way more than ever satisfied that his concern was with the affairs of his own household and his own neighborhood. On the other hand, the disaster, commercially considered, would have been a disaster for hardly anybody but the inhabitants of the city. Nobody in New York or London or Berlin would have been touched in his pocket by it, or have felt his comfort affected by it. It would no more have threatened the exchanges of these cities with a panic than the burning of Yokohama five years ago. The effect of difficulty of communication in producing a sense of remoteness is one of the familiar facts of history; but the effect of the sense of remoteness in deadening and destroying the sentiment of human brotherhood is something which we only now begin to appreciate. There have occurred within a few years calamities far more terrible, as regards the resultant misery, than the fire of Chicago. Over a million of people have perished in India by famine within a single year since the close of our war, and, at this writing, vast districts of Persia are undergoing depopulation through the same agency. More horrible still, hordes of Turkomans from the great northern desert are riding on through the villages and hamlets and carrying into slavery the unhappy survivors. After making every allowance for the effect of difference of race and of civilization in creating the indifference with which we hear of all this, a large part of it must be attributed to simple distance both in time and in miles. If the railroad or the telegraph brought these awful scenes of suffering to our very doors, neither color nor creed could stop the flow of our sympathy or prevent our sympathy being really active.

It is not true then, apparently, that the march of science has made the burning of large cities henceforth impossible. Under certain conditions of weather and material, in any modern city, fires may still break out which no machines yet invented can check. It would indeed appear, from the experience of Chicago, that when the fire attains a certain volume, its power becomes something which no machine is ever likely to be able to check, and against which no habitable building can be made "proof." Moreover, when a city burns in our time, science carries the desolation over the civilized world. The terror which spread through the streets of Chicago was felt almost as acutely in the streets of New York and London. The flames which raged there threatened full as many homes elsewhere, homes in other cities, with desolation. It was not the savings of the people of Chicago only which were destroyed, but the savings of at least as many more who never came within a thousand miles of it, and with their savings nearly everything that made life sweet. There is something grand about this, but there is also something which everybody must, in his secret heart, find appalling. There is no place on the globe now to which a weary man can go for rest; no "boundless contiguity of shade" to which the storm that shake the busy world cannot find an entrance. The fortunes of the whole race are being so closely linked together by science that there is nobody, from the hod-carrier up to the millionaire, who may not any morning read in the paper news from the uttermost ends of the earth depriving him of his fortune or his daily bread.

On the other hand, while the citizens of London after the great fire, and the citizens of Lisbon after the great earthquake, were, like the famine-stricken Hindus and Persians, left alone in their misery to battle as best they could with their sufferings and losses, Chicago, after spreading her losses over the civilized world, finds the civilized world come to her assistance. Nothing would probably have astonished Lord Brouncker more than to see countless tons of relief-stores

THE RICHMOND & LOUISVILLE MEDICAL JOURNAL for October.
Louisville, Ky.: E. S. GAILLARD, M.D. $5.00 a year.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE ASSOCIATION, the Directors have loved an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 30, 1873. All former shareholders are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the stockholder is forbidden to incur any indebtedness to the Association, and is not to stock the actually any indebtedness, and this provision will be strictly enforced. It is very desirable that the entire membership of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

AGREEMENTS elsewhere. Seven Hundred and Fifty

Shares.			$75,000
JOHN J. STEVENS, Co-wego,	N. Y.,	One	Share
C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse,	"	"	100
J. HENRY CLARKE,	"	"	100
E. B. WALDO,	"	"	100
G. N. STEARNS,	"	"	100
JOHN M. RICE,	"	"	100
MARSHALL BROS., Minneapolis,	Minn.,	"	100
S. LYDIARD, Long Lake,	"	"	100
J. G. RICHARDSON, Lake City,	"	One	Share
DR. U. K. HOUTELLE,	"	"	100
E. E. GRAMMAW, Minneapolis,	Minn.,	"	100
Mrs. E. CROSBY, Portage City,	Wis.,	"	100
WM. H. ELLERY, Burlington,	Iowa,	"	100
LYMAN T. O'BORN, Auburn,	N. Y.,	"	100
P. C. TUNNEY, Albany,	"	"	100
M. SCHLES-SINGER,	"	"	100
JOSEPH KNIGHT, Troy,	"	"	100
S. BRYANT, Dayton,	Ohio,	"	100
L. F. GARDNER, Poughkeepsie,	N. Y.,	"	100
J. C. CHATTENTON, Rutherford Park,	N. J.,	"	100
W. J. LEWIS, Iilon,	N. Y.,	"	100
HARVEY HAKES,	"	"	100
THO. BROWN, Worcester,	Mass.,	"	100
C. W. ESTERHAGEN,	"	"	100
E. LORING, Boston,	"	"	100
JUSTIN HIDEOUT,	"	Five	Shares
A. FOLSON (in trust),	"	Three	Shares
JOHN WETTERBERG,	"	One	Share
P. A. GREENE,	"	"	100
E. S. DUKHAM,	"	Two	Shares
N. CUMMINS,	"	One	Share
CHAR. T. HOW,	"	Three	Shares
GEOR. H. FOSTER,	"	One	Share
A. KNIGHT,	"	"	100
GARDNER MURPHY,	"	"	100
GEORGE HENSHAW,	"	"	100
HENRY N. STONE,	"	"	100
H. E. MANN, Fond du Lac,	Wis.,	"	100
GODFREY UNDEHM, Ionia,	Mich.,	"	100
F. P. HENSHAW, Boston,	Mass.,	One	Share
W. C. CLANNETT,	"	Two	Shares
FRANK K. WELLS,	"	One	Share
OSCAR ROOP, Taylor's Park,	Minn.,	"	100
J. D. ZIMMERMAN, Union City,	Mich.,	"	100
PHILIP A. ZIMMERMAN,	"	"	100
GEORGE HUBBARD,	"	"	100
S. H. NYE,	"	"	100
CHAS. H. SPRING,	"	"	100
D. D. W. GORDON,	"	"	100
G. K. WITHINGTON, Cincinnati,	O.,	"	100
JONATHAN WATSON, Tusaville,	Pa.,	"	100
MORRIS EINSTEN,	"	"	100
Mrs. E. W. COOK, Ravenss,	O.,	"	100
F. W. COOK, Evansville,	Ind.,	Two	Shares
Mrs. J. J. PILLSBURY,	"	"	100
MARY SISKON, Newton,	Mass.,	Four	Shares
MALTY C. S. ANKON,	"	One	Share
R. L. BAKER, St. Fairfield,	Me.,	"	100
J. F. FRAZER, Ft. Plain,	Mo.,	"	100
E. O. WINDGESSER,	"	"	100
D. R. SPARKS, Alton,	Ill.,	"	100
WESLEY BEST, Litchfield,	Conn.,	"	100
D. THURMAN, New York,	N. Y.,	"	100
LEWIS G. JONES,	"	"	100
M. B. BRANT,	"	"	200
JOHN W. CHADWICK, Brooklyn,	"	Two	Shares
E. S. DUNHAM, Boston,	Mass.,	Two	Shares
ISAAC ABER,	"	Three	Shares
CHAS. LEWIS, Richmond,	Ind.,	One	Share
GEOR. C. DUNHAM, Dayton,	Ohio,	"	100
CHRIS. A. DAY, Olneyville,	R. I.,	"	100
GEOR. LEWIS, Providence,	"	"	100
J. D. FROST,	"	"	100
CLARK JILSON,	Mass.,	"	100
A. B. GUER, Wesley Falls,	R. I.,	"	100
G. R. WITHINGTON, Cincinnati,	O.,	"	100
S. PUTNAM, North Platte,	Nebr.,	Two	Shares
A. BATE,	Cincinnati,	Ohio,	One
DI. K. WARE,	Boston,	Mass.,	"
FRANCIS ALDER,	"	Three	Shares
DANIEL F. CHILD,	"	"	100
CHAS. RICHARDSON,	"	One	Share
MRS. JOHN WILSON,	C. bridge,	"	200
A. W. TERNES,	Toledo,	Ohio,	One
J. W. SULLING,	New Bedford,	Mass.,	200
J. C. DEL'NO,	"	Two	Shares
G. A. BURN,	"	"	100
W. C. MACY,	"	"	100
MRS. J. C. GIBBING,	"	"	100
MISS MARY GIFFORD,	"	"	100
BENJ. H. TUCKER,	"	"	100
FREDERICK COPPIN,	"	"	100
CHAS. H. COFFIN,	"	"	100
G. F. MATTHEWS,	"	"	100
MRS. A. HENDERSON,	"	"	100
C. H. FINCH,	"	"	100
WMA. C. A. TUCKER,	"	"	100
JAMES M. ALDRICH, Fall River,	"	"	100
R. N. JAKER, Newport,	R. I.,	"	100
J. R. DAYTON,	"	"	100
JOSEPH B. WEAVER,	"	"	100
JOHN A. HAYES, Fairhaven,	Mass.,	Two	Shares
J. J. NICHOLS, New York,	N. Y.,	Three	Shares
JOHN W. BORG, W.,	"	FIVE	Shares
E. NAUMBERG,	"	"	100

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The INDEX will be enlarged to sixteen pages at the commencement of its fourth volume, Jan. 1 1873. After Sept. 23, 1872, the price of subscription will be $3.00 a year, in advance. But every subscriber, new or old, who remits $3.00 at once will be credited with a year's subscription from Jan. 1, and will meantime receive the paper free, if not already paid for.

The only theory of "Prison Reform" which is worth sixpence is that which aims to reform the prisoners. Such experiments as Mr. Brockway is so wisely conducting in the Detroit House of Correction promise results over which humanity may well weep tears of joy.

"Wisdom too late," oracularly remarks a friend, "is no better than foolishness."

NOVEMBER 2, 1872.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

BUSINESS NOTICE.—All communications without exception, on all matters pertaining to the paper, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO." All cheques, drafts, and post office money orders, should be made payable to "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION." No responsibility is assumed for loss of money or neglect in the fulfillment of orders, unless these directions are STRICTLY COMPLIED WITH.

FREE RELIGION AND SOCIAL REFORM

However intense may be one's faith in optimism, it must be moderated by the reflection that a large proportion of the evils that afflict human society are unnecessary and preventible. This could not be true if ours were to-day the best possible world. So far as the great universal laws of Nature are concerned, which manifestly tend to the best results in the end, we believe in optimism; but so far as the actual state of human affairs is concerned, which depend on human causes, we do not. Evolution, the keyword of modern thought, implies a gradual passage from the lower to the higher, from the less to the more perfect, and is therefore unintelligible on strictly optimistic principles. Improvement is the negation of anterior perfection. Yet the condition of things would be to-day bettered beyond all calculation, if only a little more thought could be infused into the great, stupid animal, Man. If he would but use the powers he now has, he might with ease throw off the load that so galls his foolish back. Why should he always be the saddle-horse of Destiny, when he might be Destiny's free rider? There are evils enough in the world, it is true, needing no microscope to discover; on every side they loom up like giants. But thought, the little giant-killer, would make short work with them all. The trouble is that Jack is asleep.

It would certainly be false to say that man is a contented victim. He rebels against his lot with daily increasing vehemence. But he has not yet learned how to snap the cords that bind him. Victim as he is, he is victimized above all things with bad advice.

First comes Christianity, preaching the gospel of his damnation by Adam, his salvation by Christ, and his regeneration by the Holy Ghost,—all done for him by others in one way or another. He is told that he is a poor miserable sinner, not worthy to be saved and not able to save himself, who must wait shivering with fright till God plucks him as a brand from the burning, or leaves him to be consumed, according to his own royal will. Not knowing any better than to believe what he is told, the poor creature has endured his miseries for nearly two thousand years, hoping for a salvation that should be let down to him out of heaven, and neglecting the salvation that lay all the while in his own right arm. But the dull motions of his brain, puzzling over the great theological riddle that has no answer, are by degrees communicating themselves to the long disused muscles, and the seven green withs that bind the captive Samson are beginning to crack. Wornied out with waiting for reform till the advent of the "kingdom of Christ," the world impatiently demands it here and now.

In answer to this demand, a swarm of special reforms have sprung into prominence within the last half century, outside of the churches and having no definite relation to them. The mere fact of their existence is proof of the felt failure of Christianity to redeem the race. But whether these various special reforms, useful as they are in many ways, will be able to accomplish their special objects with adequacy or thoroughness, is more than doubtful. So far as they confine themselves to the securing of some definite measure (for instance, the legal abolition of slavery), a brilliant apparent success is possible; but the success that is really needed, the extinction of the spirit of slavery, is not to be gained by a vote of Congress, a Presidential proclamation, or the million-footed tread of victorious armies. Nay, an outward success over which the special reformer shouts himself hoarse may be a death-blow to his reform. For example, the triumph of "prohibition" would in all likelihood be the defeat of temperance. Here are millions of people that want to buy liquor; there are thousands of people that want to sell it. Pass, if you please, a stringent prohibitory law in every State: does any one believe that it is going to step in between every dealer and his customer, and prevent the traffic? The outward signs of the traffic might cease; but the traffic would go on in a more secret, more degrading, more dangerous way. Drive back from the surface a cutaneous eruption, which is at once the sign and the safety-valve of interior disease, and death may be the consequence. So is it with this black world-curse of intemperance. The evil itself is the ungovernable craving for sensual excitement, while the liquor-traffic is only one of its many channels of gratification; which being stopped up by law, the stream does but force its way in a new direction, all the more perilous to society if under ground. "Prohibition" is an open confession of failure in the cause of temperance, that is, the government of the senses by conscience and reason; and the fact that so many of the noblest people enthusiastically advocate it only shows the inherent impossibility of wisely carrying on a special reform with reference to itself alone. Reliance upon special measures as more important than general principles, which results almost inevitably from too close attention to a special evil, is the most formidable obstacle to the real and permanent cure of that very evil. There is doubtless an occasional necessity for local treatment in cases of disease; but the whole tendency of modern science is towards the substitution of general treatment so far as possible. Regimen, cleanliness, air, exercise, and so forth, are of infinitely greater consequence than medicine in the general preservation of health, as is confessed by all the wisest physicians of to-day. Yet the special reformer, relying upon his one or two pet measures as the adequate cure for his pet evil, exhibits the wisdom of the physician who, when his patient is suffering from a general disease of the blood, should aim solely to cure one arm or one leg, or even one finger.

There is no cause to wonder that the world is so cold and unresponsive to the appeals of special reformers, when we consider how few of them manifest any comprehension of the general ideas which underlie their own special reforms. Still less cause for wonder is there when we observe the extravagances of speech and action which naturally enough attend this ignorance of or contempt for the universal principles involved. In order to recommend the special measure urged upon the public, the most glowing pictures are drawn of the magical changes to be wrought by it in the world's condition,—pictures which, as the common sense of mankind at once perceives, can correspond to nothing real in the heavens above, or in the earth below, or in the waters under the earth. Or the special measure is framed in direct violation, perhaps, of the very principle on which it professes to be based. Or a measure urged in behalf of one reform clashes directly with a measure urged in behalf of some sister reform, both being advocated in the name of the selfsame principle.

In a thousand ways, the multiplication of reformatory movements and measures in recent times, each pressing forward "on its own hook," and each clamorously demanding the exclusive or paramount attention of the public, tends directly to check the development of that uniform, wide-spread, and intelligent public opinion which must precede the triumph of reform in any of its aspects. The utter lack of unity in these movements, or at least any such unity as can be made visible to the sluggish eyes of the world, and the intellectual confusion which they beget in the minds of thousands whose ears are stunned by this worse than hackman-hubbub, are the chief obstacle, in our opinion, to the success even of the most excellent special measures. People get tired of being called on to comprehend all the arguments, and remember all the facts, of many unconnected, independent, and perhaps inharmonious movements; and fatigue generates indifference or even disgust. Until these isolated special reforms can be clustered about some simple central ideas, easy to understand and to remember, no great headway will ever be made in the direction of the substantial, methodical, and rapid improvement of society. The really valuable special reforms (we exclude certain pseudo-reforms that make a great noise in the world) need above everything else to be brought into relation, traced back to the universal principles of which they are the outgrowth, and affiliated in such order and connection that all the reformatory forces of modern society can work together harmoniously and powerfully to a common end,—not, as now too often, nullifying and defeating each other by a useless dissipation or opposition of energies. Before there can be that outward association of all mankind into a single Co-operative Union which is the golden dream of the best minds and hearts of our time, and which alone could cope successfully with the enormous social miseries that sadden us all either to see or to share, there must first be a thorough association of ideas, plans, purposes, among all those who believe in reform as possible and are willing to work in order to make it actual. Intellectual unity must precede organic unity. Is it possible in such a chaos of conflicting cries?

On this point something will be said in another article.

A PROTEST.

I always feel like making a protest whenever I hear the term "Free Religionist;" not so much against what may be signified by the term (though some who use it might find it difficult to say what they signify by it) as against the phrase. Strictly speaking, it must be called at least a rhetorical impropriety, if not a barbarism. The word religionist is not a word in very good repute. Etymologically it means, of course, one who professes a religion; but, as Worcester says of it, it is "generally used in a bad sense, as synonymous with bigot." It is sometimes used in a good sense, but its more customary meaning is a bad one. The term, therefore, for the purpose for which it is meant to apply it, seems to me to be condemned on the score of correct rhetoric.

But I always feel an objection to it on other grounds. In spite of the adjective "free," there is something of a sectarian look about it. Especially when I see or hear it used, as it not infrequently is, in such combinations as this, "Radical Unitarians, Infidels, Spiritualists, Free Religionists, Come-outers," &c., do I shake my head and say to myself, the speaker, or writer, has no proper understanding of what the phrase "Free Religionist" means, or of what it ought to mean if it is to be used at all. The "Free Religionists," certainly, cannot be thus classified as a division of people apart from the other classes here named. The phrase has come into such use as it has obtained since the organization of the Free Religious Association. It is derived from the name of that Association, and is meant, of course, to indicate the members of the Association and those who may be in sympathy with the general aims and principles of the Association, though not nominally members. But among the members of the Association, to say nothing of the large body of sympathizers not registered by name as members, will be found some who would designate themselves as "Radicals," "Unitarians," "Spiritualists," "Infidels," "Come-outers," as well as by other names indicating liberal and progressive phases of religious thought. Evidently, then, such a classification as that made above is erroneous. The "Free Religionist," instead of being one term in such a classification, includes all the terms. Indeed, when we have said that the Free Religious Association represents those general liberal and progressive tendencies of religious thought, which are taking people off the ground of ecclesiastical and traditional authority and putting them upon the ground of the authority of man's mental and moral intelligence, have we not indicated what the term "Free Religionist," if it is to be used at all, must properly mean? It should signify one who believes in the full and free application of reason to all problems, speculative and practical, of religion.

Perhaps in time the name may be redeemed from the present objectionable features that attach to it; but it is to be hoped that the free religious movement is not to be hampered and injured by a name crudely understood and prematurely crystallized. Names in religious movements are very convenient, and perhaps inevitable; but there is danger in them. While we hold firmly to truth, let us beware of the fetter of a name.

W. J. P.

SATISFYING PREACHING.

A writer in the Liberal Christian listened lately to a rationalist preacher, whether in this country or abroad we cannot say, and came away unsatisfied. The discourse was brilliant, interesting, abounding in thought, sparkling with illustration. The hearers sat through it attentive and to all appearance interested. But as he watched the people coming out of church, he observed on not a few countenances an expression which indicated a similar disappointment to his own. Evidently they had not been fed—with his food. It is quite likely. In every congregation, on any particular day, there must be some who are not "fed" by the special sermon they had heard. No sermon meets every listener's need. But that is no sign that the sermons delivered from the desk fail to meet the need of the greater number, or, on the whole, of all who seek the individual's ministration. Had our friend looked in other faces, he might have seen satisfaction and something more—an expression of gratitude and cheer from what they had heard. It is quite possible that one standing in the vestibule, say, of "All Souls' Church," or the "Church of the Disciples," or Mr. Beecher's, as the audience come out, might detect a look of disappointment on here and there a face. They had had too much of what they didn't want, too little of what they did; too much of Christ, too little of God; too much doctrine, too little wisdom; too much edification, too little instruction; too much sentiment, too little thought; too much Bible, too little Word; too much tradition, too little knowledge; too much admonition, too little cheer; too much gospel, too little reason; too much unction, too little ointment.

It is odd that "pectoral" preaching should be in such good repute among liberal Christians whom the entire Evangelical world is holding in abhorrence for being so intellectual. It is the remainder of the old heaven not yet left out of the composition of the bread of life. One is sure of saying the right thing who praises warm, impulsive, emotional preaching, which has a mellowing effect on the feelings, and in the same breath finds superfluous fault with "fine sermons," "great sermons," "intellectual sermons," which address only the reason. A noted minister in Boston has recently said (and his saying has been generally echoed with favor) that it was not the minister's business to preach great discourses. Alas! Are Channing and Dewey and Parker so soon forgotten? For my part, I should be sorry to think it the business of the minister to preach great sermons; not that such are too numerous or unprofitable, but because it is a very hard thing to do, and it is not pleasant to consider that so many admirable men are unmindful of their business. But it would seem to be the preacher's clear duty to preach as great sermons as he can. Why undertake to address people at all, unless one gives them the very best he has, and unless he prepares himself to give his best? And it is surely impossible to do one's best without exerting all the intellectual power he possesses. At my ordination, twenty-five years ago, the preacher of greatest repute in Boston charged me that I could not put too much well-directed intellectual force into a sermon, and I have felt pledged to try and do that every time.

Did the phrase well-directed imply that the intellectual force was not to be used intellectually? How then can it be used? Intellect, whatever its aim, must consult the intellectual laws. The greatest Evangelical preachers were highly intellectual; they made people use their minds to some purpose. Their most effective sermons were not other than "fine," "magnificent," "grand." Was it their merit that they were aimed at the heart and not at the head? They were aimed at the heart through the head. They set forth views, doctrines, arguments, philosophical reasonings. They were meant to produce conviction, to fasten upon the mind certain strong chains of thought, which had been fashioned by prodigious labor in the study.

And this, precisely this, is what the rationalist preacher proposes to do. To him it seems vastly more important to instruct his hearers in the new philosophy of the universe and of human life, to give them a new view of the meaning of existence, to explain to them the laws of character and of society, to reveal to them the conditions of happiness, than to touch their feelings or to send a momentary thrill along the nerves of their moral sense. That the average audiences do not enjoy this kind of ministration as keenly as the other may be the case; they are less accustomed to it. But that they profit by it less I am slow to believe; and that they will learn to enjoy it more as they are more accustomed to it, is more than probable. After all, the only thing that satisfies people in the end is truth; and the more clearly it is presented to them the better. Scrappy talking may be tolerated; but the first condition of solid success is that a speaker shall respect the minds of his auditors.

Emerson says: "The religion which is to guide and fulfil the present and coming ages, whatever else it be, must be intellectual. The scientific mind must have a faith which is science." Perhaps Mr. Emerson would not find so much dissatisfaction in the members of the rationalist's congregation. The greatest preacher in America, by far, is Mr. Beecher; and he owes his eminence to the broad intellectuality of his mind. Whoever will allow himself the pleasure of reading his "Lectures on Preaching" will discover that something beside sentiment is needed for "satisfying" preaching; that, in the judgment of this great exemplar, all the mind one can get is none too much for the sermon; and that failure is the result, not of sermons that are too great, but of sermons that are too little. O. B. F.

PROF. TYNDALL IN BOSTON.

Mr. Tyndall's name and reputation are so familiar to the readers of THE INDEX that I think they will like a brief account of his first lectures in America. No scientific man has been so eagerly welcomed since Agassiz first lectured in this country. The announcement of the lectures was very brief, and many did not learn of the time for procuring tickets, and yet the rush for them was so great that the waiting throng reached nearly the whole length of Bromfield street. The Hall was crowded by an eager and attentive audience. I was not fortunate enough to get a ticket and so missed the opening lecture; but a friend kindly gave me one for the second.

Mr. Tyndall is a tall, slender man, with a bright and intelligent face, and a decidedly English accent. It does not, however, render his speech either unpleasant or unintelligible. His manner is unaffected and genial, and he puts himself into entirely friendly and affectionate relation with his audience, smoothing away every little mistake or failure in the experiments with a pleasant joke, and continuing his explanations from the speaker's desk or the assistant's stand, wherever he may happen to be.

He opened the first lecture with an admirable statement of the importance of original investigation, before he went on to illustrate the properties of light by experiments with the electric light and the carbon points.

His second lecture was on color; and in a series of experiments with the spectrum he illustrated very clearly the composition of light and the essential principles of spectrum analysis. He said that these lectures would not be designed for learned audiences, but would be elementary, as he had understood that he would have cultivated and intelligent, but not strictly scientific audiences. There was, therefore, nothing very new or original in the subject matter of the lecture; but the great charm was in the perfect clearness of the explanations, and in the perfection and beauty of the experiments. To one who has only read of Spectrum Analysis, actually to see the lines of sodium and thallium is a pleasure almost akin to that of beholding the Milo Venus in the original for the first time.

He made the very welcome announcement that, "when he came to America again" (he tried to change his conjunction to if, but the storm of applause prevented him), he should give a course of lectures more specially adapted to scientific people, in which he should discuss more difficult problems. He said: "Man and Nature had both given him so kindly a reception that he should feel very much disposed to come again."

I most earnestly hope he will, and feel a great debt of gratitude to those who have procured for us the great satisfaction of seeing and hearing a man who has done such great service both by scientific research and liberal thought. I trust, also, that the stimulus his lectures will give to scientific study will lead many of our country lycœums to arrange next year for courses of scientific lectures which shall give valuable information, instead of a desultory course of entertaining essays on various themes. E. D. C.

The following paragraph from the New York Times is a fair specimen of the manner in which the Roman Catholics in this country "keep the word of promise to the ear, but break it to the hope." Where the idea of liberty has such firm hold of the people as it has in the United States, there is no possibility of success in Catholic propaganda, unless, at least in sound, the claims of Catholicism are reconciled with it. But how utterly the idea of liberty is stricken out of the word, will appear plain to any one who knows how completely enslaved is the State when "subordinated" to the Church. If any one wants to enjoy the "liberty" exemplified to the world in the history of the Spanish Inquisition and the massacre of St. Bartholomew, let him "stand firmly by the Pope."

"Liberty has no guarantee where there is no divinely commissioned spiritual authority; that is to say, where there is no divinely commissioned Church, with authority from God, above and independent of secular society, to which the State is subordinated and bound to hear, and whose decisions in the case are for it the law of God, which it must not transgress and must observe. Here is the significance of the decree of the council of the Vatican, defining the Pope to be, by divine right, the supreme governor of the universal Church. Hence, whoever wars against the Pope wars against liberty, and is playing, whether he knows it or not, into the hands of despotism, and a despotism that extends alike over both body and soul. Let Catholics stand, then, firmly by the Pope."

Who can help admiring the gentlemanly and Christian tone of the following criticism on one of our fellow-workers, contained several weeks ago in the New York Christian Advocate?

"An editorial contributor to THE INDEX whose initials are W. H. S. writes about the council at North Adams, and this is part of what he says:

"These three Orthodox preachers called this old pivotal doctrine [of eternal punishment] a non-essential doctrine. If so, pray what is essential? A belief in the supernatural divinity and sacrifice of Jesus? Essential for what? Not for salvation, for they admit they do not believe in damnation."

They admitted nothing of the sort. They all believe in hell, and that all liars shall have their part in it. W. H. S. may not believe this, but he has personal reasons for examining the subject carefully."

It is at least well to have on record this express avowal that the Christian Advocate does "believe in hell," as it evidently means to endorse what it takes to be the belief of the "three Orthodox preachers."

Mr. S. H. Morse, late editor of the Boston Radical, has very kindly sent to us specimens of his fine medallions of Grant and Greeley, advertised on our last page. They do great credit to his artistic powers, and make a very handsome ornament for the parlor or study. Let every friend of the present presidential candidates purchase one or the other of these medallions, not only for their own sake (and they are well worth the money), but also as a tribute of gratitude and respect to a noble man who has given seven of the best years of his life to unremunerative, modest, and singularly disinterested labor for the radical cause.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

THE BAIT AND THE TRAP.

BY CHARLES K. WHIPPLE.

For years past, some of our more enthusiastic Orthodox brethren have been sounding the praises of Mr. K. A. Burnell, a Western man who calls himself "a lay evangelist." His success in the West has been such that he was invited last year by the Boston Young Men's Christian Association to engineer "revival" movements in Massachusetts. This enterprise closed with some "Union meetings" held in Boston in March last; and, if we can trust the report of the Corresponding Secretary and factotum of the Young Men's Christian Association Mr. Burnell had then addressed large numbers of people in this State, having held thirty-five meetings in as many towns and cities within seventy-five days. These meetings, designed to establish and promote "revivals," were arranged by the B. Y. M. C. A., and conducted by some of its functionaries in conjunction with Mr. Burnell, the fame and skill of the latter gentleman seeming to be mainly relied on for success. Mr. Burnell has certainly deserved success, in so far as diligence in the use of means implies such desert; and by engaging him, the managers of the B. Y. M. C. A. have shown their thorough appreciation of the use of means, and their skill in the choice of agents; though, when success attends any of the elaborate industries carried on by these agents, they make a point of bestowing "all the glory" in another quarter.

Mr. Burnell is, indeed, a very skilful speaker. I was about to say that he is well worth hearing, but that remark requires qualification. The songs of the Syrians were well worth hearing to those who had taken such precautions as Ulysses did against injury from them. So the mellifluous speech of Mr. Burnell is really worth hearing by one who is able to go into the way of temptation without yielding to temptation.

Mr. Burnell is, manifestly, a genial, social, friendly man. His countenance is sweet and pleasant, his voice agreeable, his command of language abundant, his fluency in expression and illustration wonderful. He can talk, apparently without end, yet always charmingly, and never with the slightest appearance of egotism, even when his own experience or his own action is the subject in hand.

He is engaged by his employers to do a work of proselytism among the people whom they call "impenitent sinners." He, however, does not call them so. He perfectly understands that flies are not to be caught with vinegar. His employers want him to get people into their churches, or put them in train to get in, assuming that hell must be the ultimate portion of all outsiders. Mr. Burnell does this work, it is said, with great success; but he says not a word about either hell or the church. He leaves all the unpleasant explanations to be given by those who may come after. Knowing that it is the first step which costs, and that whoever is persuaded to say A will be likely to say B, and proceed to C, he applies himself exclusively to that first step.

Mr. Burnell's forte is the excitement of sympathy among his audience, and he accomplishes this in a masterly manner. He has stories without number, genuinely interesting and affecting, and he tells them with a perfection of manner such as Mr. Everett himself could not surpass. As, in a novel, there must always be a lover and a maid, so in Mr. Burnell's stories, the invariable characters are a person "without an interest in Christ," and a friend, new or old, who, with or without other acts of friendliness, persuades the first of his need of such an "interest," of the feasibility of obtaining it, and of the need of obtaining it at once. These two persons may be much, little, or not at all related to each other, and there may or may not be other parties and other incidents concerned in the story. There is almost always, however, an affecting appeal to the remembrance of paternal and maternal love, and there is always a remorse, or a longing, or a sense of want, which can only be appeased by the attainment of that "interest in Christ" which it is Mr. Burnell's business to supply. Mr. Burnell (to judge from his stories) seems never to have met with a person who, being without this form of spiritual comfort, was not earnestly desirous of obtaining it. He seems (still judging from his stories) quite unaware of the possibility of loving God, seeking to do his will, and living on good terms with him, without getting the business transacted at the office of some agent, go-between, or middle-man; and quite unaware of the existence of persons who, loving and serving God thus, are satisfied with that relation, and feel no need of any extra policy of insurance. All the people Mr. Burnell tells about "would give all they have in the world" to possess a faith stamped and endorsed after his particular fashion.

Apart from the "interest in Christ" which Mr.

Burnell insists upon as the one thing needful, he makes particular mention of only one article of that Orthodox creed, the acceptance of which in full is by and by to be required of his proselytes. Original sin, total depravity, election, predestination, damnation, and that striking peculiarity in the Orthodox idea of the Heavenly Father which makes him utterly indifferent to penitence and reformation beyond the grave, in the case of those who have not repented and reformed on this side of it—all these are taken for granted by him, but he seems to judge it best not to talk about them. They are not of the nature of bait, and the open presentation of them would scare from the trap those whom he is trying to draw into it. The only Orthodox dogma which he talks about and enlarges upon besides the Christ-theory, is the theory that every word in the Bible is God's word; and that we must have a child-like faith in that book, and believe everything contained in it, from Genesis to Revelation. If his hearers will only take this point for granted, and say that they desire an interest in Christ, and stand up or kneel down to be prayed with, there is great probability that their cases will be successfully finished, in a few days or weeks, by some of the subordinates.

Of course, Mr. Burnell discourages argument or discussion, in relation to any of those points wherein reason and the natural sense of right and justice are at issue with the Orthodox theories. In the opening meeting of the series in Boston above alluded to, when Mr. Burnell was appointed to follow Mr. Hepworth in remarks on the question—"How shall Christians meet the modern scepticism or Free Religion of the day?"—they both earnestly deprecated reasoning about the dogmas of the creed, and Mr. Burnell frankly gave his judgment in the following words:—

"We don't want logic, but simple faith in the book [holding up the Bible]. Isn't scepticism sin? And doesn't the Bible say, 'The wages of sin is death'?"

Among those "sinners" who have been regular Attendants on Orthodox preaching, a considerable number are fully prepared to swallow the mass of assumption. These, of course, are easily magnetized by Mr. Burnell to the point of openly taking the first step, and "committing themselves" as seekers for "an interest in Christ." The attainment of this, they are led to expect, will secure for them not only salvation in the next world, but permanent joy and peace in the present one.

What wonder that, with this pleasant prospect before them, sundry enthusiastic young people and sundry anxious older ones should take the bait which Mr. Burnell offers? All that they have to do, they are told, is to give themselves to Jesus, and accept for themselves the atonement he has provided. Amidst the excitements of a "revival," the solicitation of relatives and friends who think it indispensable for you to accept those traditions of the elders which they long ago accepted, the enthusiasm of new converts, and the testimony of respectable old church-members that they have never known a doubt nor a fear since they gave themselves to Jesus, and that his promise to give them whatever they asked in faith has never once failed,—under all these influences, I say, what wonder that the contagion spreads, and that many apply for the rich inheritance proffered on such easy terms. The drawbacks and incumbrances are discovered later, one by one; but long before that time Mr. Burnell has gone, and is setting the trap somewhere else.

When a young man has once taken that first step which it is Mr. Burnell's department to persuade him to, he finds himself taken in charge by sundry of the proselytes of the Y. M. C. A., who examine him, pray with him, exhort him as to the things he is expected to believe and the things he is expected to say and do, then pray with him again, and thenceforward undertake, as far as they are allowed, the direction of his thoughts, words, and actions. He finds his whole life searched into, spied upon, reported upon, and manipulated, as far as possible, in the interest of the Y. M. C. A., and of the group of churches whose agents the officers of that Association are. He finds that the "interest in Christ," which he received on the ground of the joy, rest, and peace it was to bring, is understood as pledging him to believe sundry unreasonable things as true, to refrain from sundry innocent or salutary things as wicked, and to go through with sundry daily formalities as important duties. Hestiation about any of these points will call forth suspicion and remonstrance from his self-elected guardians; and the refusal to follow their dictation in any of these matters, or the claim that he must decide for himself what are his own duties, in opposition to their judgment, will subject him to the reproach of being a "backslider." Their object is to mould and fashion him after the pattern of their church; that is to say, after the pattern of some one of the four churches banded together for proselytism in their Association. If he has a mind of his own, and forms and adheres to an idea different from theirs of the service God requires of him, he will be treated by them as an outsider, and remanded anew to the class of publicans and "sinners."

If it were fairly understood in the revival-meeting or the prayer-meeting that giving one's self to Jesus will be of no avail unless accompanied or followed by belief in hell, and in the sort of God whose pleasure it was to create hell, and then to create men and women to suffer eternally there, probably fewer persons would swallow the bait, and thus fewer would be caught in the trap.

In every town and village there are many who avoid or escape the snare of the sectarian proselyter. A proportion of these see that life is real and earnest, the beginning of an unending existence, and that their future, both in this world and the next, must be materially influenced by the characters they are forming here and now. If any one of this class asks, "What shall I do in view of this future? How shall I form a character acceptable to God and useful to man? How am I to know God's purposes in regard to me, and how shall I co-operate with him to fulfil them?"—if any one, I say, asks these questions, the answer is easy, however difficult may be the execution.

Such a one may well take to heart and act upon this saying of Jesus: "Why, even of yourselves, judge ye not what is right?" Let your reason and conscience take counsel together on this matter. Are there known duties which you have been accustomed to neglect in daily life? Are there temptations, customary or occasional, which you have allowed to gain the victory over you? It is certainly God's will (is it not?) that you should fulfil those duties, and resist those temptations, and form the habit of right living, and strengthen it by daily use. Apply yourself, day by day, to this work, and seek, from all sources, light to guide and strength to fortify you in it. Whenever you fall in any point, whenever you come short in any point, notice the fact, seek the cause of it for avoidance in the future, try again, keep trying, never cease trying. Living thus, you will be in the line of duty and of progress; and you need neither dread sudden death of the body, nor apply at an insurance office to secure future welfare for your soul.

IDEAL AND HISTORICAL CHRISTIANITY.

CAMBRIDGEPORT, Oct. 9, 1872.

Mrs. ABBOT:

I want to say a few words in THE INDEX, on the subject of "Ideal and Historical Christianity." I have been reading your and Professor Newman's thoughts on the subject, A. W. Stevens in the Radical, and A. J. Grover in THE INDEX. "Christ or Miracle" I think is charming.

What is historical Christianity? In the first place allow me to say that I do not think it is possible to find it. It is like the Irishman's flea,—when you think you have put your finger on it, it is gone. You say it is the Roman Catholic Church. Professor Newman says, No—that is a corruption of Christianity. Mr. Stevens says it is the Orthodox Church. Dr. Bellows says that it is the Unitarian; and so forth.

I think Mr. Grover is right when he says that men live two lives—one actual, the other ideal. But allow me to suggest what to me looks like the truth, that no one can see or comprehend our actual lives but ourselves. When we look at the best and wisest men of the past and present, we see simply our idealization of them; that is, our best and highest thoughts of these men constitute for us the ideal men. It is probable that our conception of great men is a very different thing from the real and actual men themselves. What do I know, for instance, about the real and actual Socrates, Jesus, Luther, Milton, Shakespeare, Parker, Holyoake, Mill, Spencer, Emerson, Bartol, Abbot? I have been reading and admiring Emerson for twenty-five years, yet what do I know about the real, actual Emerson? Do I comprehend or understand him? Far from it. I have my ideal Emerson, and to me he seems greater than Jesus. But what are the actual facts about the merits and demerits of the two men I am unable to say.

It seems to me that we have nothing but our own and other people's ideals of Christianity. We can have no real and actual historical Christianity. When I hear Christians—Catholic, Orthodox, or Unitarian—extolling the virtues of Christianity, and try to understand what they mean by it, I find that they all idealize the thing. That is, they interpret Christianity so as to make it harmonize with their best and highest thoughts of truth and right.

To show the great difficulty of ascertaining actual facts, allow me to tell the story of the Frenchman who was going to write the history of the world. Having got his room well filled with books and manuscripts, and being about to sit down to his writing, he heard a noise under his window; going out to ascertain what was the matter, he got so many contradictory accounts of the affair that he went into his room and threw his books into the fire, saying that if he could not find out what happened under his own window, it was useless to think of trying to write an account of what had happened in the whole world.

Some one has truly said that words have no fixed meaning, that they can only mean what each person has the power of understanding from them. And as no two persons have the same understanding or seeing power, therefore no two persons understand or see any one thing alike. How then can we expect to see Christianity as Jesus saw it? It is impossible.

It has been said, again, that God made man in his own image; and also, that man makes God in his own image. It seems to me that we all make Christianity in our own image.

Yours respectfully,
JOHN VERITY.

MISCELLANEOUS REFLECTIONS.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, ESQ.:

Dear Sir,—I attended a lecture sometime ago—or I may call it an address—delivered in a public school of this city, and was very much pleased to see how broad and radical the views were which the lecturer advanced upon scientific and other matters. The audience was a small but intelligent and appreciative one. But the lecture seemed to me to be quite out of place where Bible-reading in school was tolerated. There was no mention of God made in it but as the higher Being whom we generally speak and think of as being the creator of the present earth, and none of Christ. The lecturer closed with saying that, believing there would certainly be an end to matter—how soon was not of any consequence—he believed it must have had a beginning, and therefore a Creator. A close like this I felt to be very unsatisfactory; for, having reasoned thus far, he ought of necessity to have said something about his ideal of the Creator: whether he had existed from infinity or had sprung up with matter, a question of the highest importance, which can or cannot be answered. If from infinity, how he conceived or by what process of reasoning he had arrived at it, excluding revelation; if with matter, what had been the cause of his appearance and had given him the power to make natural laws, &c. I see no other way open for a man who believes matter is not eternal but to accept the God of the Bible; if not wholly, at least substantially. I am inclined to think that a man holding such an opinion would be soon crushed by a materialist such as Underwood. There is no doubt that the great and real question now to be solved by science is: "Is there a God?" This finally answered, we can then proceed in our investigation of things which are now only guessed at or assumed; but until this doubt is settled, we must pause.

It seems to be a truth which all Christian sects establish by their actions that, whatever one thoroughly believes, he is undeniably justified in persecuting others—even unto death—for not believing, in order to convert them, without pausing for a moment to consider whether such a course is just or not. For Roman Catholics and other Christians are thoroughly convinced that what they believe is the only truth, and therefore they are, according to themselves, quite justified in trying to convert others to their opinion, and for that purpose in using the most violent means to effect their aim if milder ones fail. But as it happens, the Brahmin, Buddhist, Mahometan, nay, even the savage and idolater are quite as much convinced as the Christian that they are right, therefore they also are justified on the same principle in using the same means as their friendly and merciful brothers use. What holds good for one holds good for all, and that in everything. And this is where lies the fallacy of the whole argument, as it makes might—right.

Another thought has always struck me forcibly about the plagues of Egypt, and this is it: "How was God justified in sending the ten plagues on the Egyptians, instead of upon Pharaoh alone, who was really the only offending party?" The Bible says that he "smote all the first-born of Egypt." Now it is very clear that the Egyptians themselves had very little, if anything, to do with the slavery of the Hebrews; for if Pharaoh had but said, "Let the Hebrews go," no one would have disputed his royal word. Besides which, Pharaoh desired once or twice to let them go, but the account says: "And the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart so that he would not let the people go." Admitting the God of the Bible and pretended revelation, it would have been impossible for Pharaoh, or any one else, to exhibit any power whatever, if God really hardened his heart, which is but another way of expressing the taking away of one's will, and thereby rendering him utterly incapable of acting as he would. The whole account is but a description of the injustice of God, if true. Even human justice would be better than his, as the law of most countries which are civilized or even uncivilized does not condemn and punish a whole family for the misdoing of one of the members, especially if he in a certain degree had not been able to act otherwise.

One more thought and I close. It has always seemed to me strange that nations so far removed from the country where Jesus was born should place such implicit belief in the accounts of him, and acknowledge him as the Son of God with only such slight testimony as the four Gospels contain; more especially as the nation of which he was a subject does even unto this day deny his divinity, as the Jews certainly do. It really is an astonishing fact. For the question naturally arises, who is likely to know the best, the people with whom he spent his life and amongst whom he worked his miracles, or those who have only an account of him in the shape of the four Gospels? Yet the latter declare it infallibly true, the former absolutely false.

Permit me to make an illustration, which may not be the best, but is as good a one as I can think of. Suppose the Chinese were to assert that there never took place in America a Declaration of Independence: which would the world believe, and which would be likely to know the best, the Chinese, or the Americans? 'Tis as simple to answer this question that it requires not a moment's reflection. Yet foreign nations persist in knowing better than Jews themselves who was born and lived amongst them, although being obliged to take the Old Testament, the history of the Jews, for the foundation of their New Testament with its Christ, atonement, crucifixion, ascension, &c.; whereas, if they had not the Jewish tradition contained in the first two chapters of Genesis about the fall of man, their New Testament could not stand a moment. How strange such things appear to one who has thoroughly freed himself from their benumbing influence! Yet they exist to this day and are believed by millions, whose minds we ought to endeavor with all our might to undeceive.

But I have already occupied more space than I ought to have done, and therefore I will now close with the hope that the time is not far distant when reason and science alone will be taken as the only guides for intelligent men to follow.

Yours in faith, H. W. N.

IS IT ONLY "FAITH"?

MR. ABBOT:—

In a late INDEX Dr. Sunderland writes "faith" twenty times in about one column. I often read such articles from his pen. His main idea is that Spiritualism, like Christianity and all other kindred religions, is built on "faith"—not on knowledge.

My evidence of the present existence of several of my relations whose earthly bodies have long been buried, and of my real communication with them, is of the same nature as my evidence that La Roy Sunderland exists, and that I have received letters from him. Millions of honest men and women would testify to the above fact. We know it to be a fact. Permit me to ask Dr. Sunderland if our evidence of his existence, and that the letters in our drawers signed by his name are really from him, is no more than faith? Such "faith" will satisfy me on almost any subject. Mrs. Kent has not read his letters or articles, yet through me as a "medium" she has no doubt that Dr. Sunderland is an actual man. Such "faith" will do. If this is only faith, may not faith be sometimes about as good as much which is allowed to be knowledge?

Fraternally, AUSTIN KENT.
STOCKHOLM, N. Y., Sept. 1872.

AN INQUIRY.

EDITOR OF INDEX:—

Will you please inform your readers whether or not President Grant and Schuyler Colfax signed one of the original calls for a convention to make the theological amendment to the Constitution of the United States? The information may be useful to other readers as well as to

INQUIRER.

[Both General Grant and Mr. Colfax, a year or two ago, signed in their private capacity an invitation to the European branch of the Protestant Evangelical Alliance to hold one of its meetings in New York; and the officers of the American branch of the Alliance, with great impropriety, appended to the signatures their official titles. We consider even an unofficial signature as wholly wrong under the circumstances. But neither of these men, so far as we know, ever signed the call for a Christian Amendment Convention; and we do not believe they would ever sign one.—Ed.]

AN ANTIDELUVIAN PARAGRAPH.

Has the Chicago Interior any grand-children? If so, it is pleasant to think how in future years, looking over the venerable files, they will smile to come upon such paragraphs as the following. It is extracted from one of its recent utterances upon the sacredness of the Sabbath:—

"Originally instituted on the day after Creation was finished, it symbolized the great Sabbath of time and of the heavenly world. It was, moreover, a sign between God and Israel through all their generations, as the rainbow was a sign to Noah."

H. L. B.

"Though all the winds of doctrine were let loose upon the earth, so truth be among them we need not fear. Let her and falsehood grapple: who ever knew her to be put to the worst in a free and open encounter?"—John Milton.

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 8.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 9, 1872.

WHOLE No. 150.

A Chapter of Accidents in Comparative Theology.

BY PROFESSOR MAX MUELLER.

Very different from the real similarities that can be discovered in nearly all the religions of the world, and which, owing to their deeply human character, in no way necessitate the admission that one religion borrowed from the other, are those minute coincidences between the Jewish and the Pagan religions which have so often been discussed by learned theologians, and which were intended by them as proof positive, either that the Pagans borrowed their religious ideas direct from the Old Testament, or that some fragments of a primeval revelation, granted to the ancestors of the whole race of mankind, had been preserved in the temples of Greece and Italy. Bochart, in his "Geographia Sacra," considered the identity of Noah and Saturn so firmly established as hardly to admit of the possibility of a doubt. The three sons of Saturn—Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto—he represented as having been originally the three sons of Noah: Jupiter being Ham; Neptune, Japhet; and Shem, Pluto. Even in the third generation the two families were proved to have been one, for Plut, the son of Ham, or of Jupiter Hammon, could be no other than Apollo Pythius; Canaan no other than Mercury; and Nimrod no other than Bacchus, whose original name was supposed to have been Bar-chus, the son of Cush. G. J. Vossius, in his learned work "De Origine et Progressu Idolatriæ" (1688), identified Saturn with Adam, Janus with Noah, Pluto with Ham, Neptune with Japhet, Minerva with Naamah, Vulcan with Tubal Cain, Typhon with Og. Huet, the friend of Bochart, and the colleague of Bossuet, went still further; and in his classical work, the "Demonstratio Evangelica," he attempted to prove that the whole theology of the heathen nations was borrowed from Moses, whom he identified not only with ancient law-givers, like Zoroaster and Orpheus, but with gods and demi-gods, such as Apollo, Vulcan, Faunus, and Priapus.

All this happened not more than two hundred years ago; and even a hundred years ago, nay, even after the discovery of Sanskrit and the rise of Comparative Philology, the troublesome ghost of Huet was by no means laid at once. On the contrary, as soon as the ancient language and religion of India became known in Europe, they were received by many people in the same spirit. Sanskrit, like all other languages, was to be derived from Hebrew, the ancient religion of the Brahmans from the Old Testament.

There was at that time an enthusiasm among Oriental scholars, particularly at Calcutta, and an interest for Oriental antiquities in the public at large, of which we in these days of apathy for Eastern literature can hardly form an adequate idea. Everybody wished to be first in the field, and to bring to light some of the treasures which were supposed to be hidden in the sacred literature of the Brahmans. Sir William Jones, the founder of the Asiatic Society at Calcutta, published in the first volume of the "Asiatic Researches" his famous essay "On the Gods of Greece, Italy, and India;" and he took particular care to state that his essay, though published only in 1788, had been written in 1784. In that essay he endeavored to show that there existed an intimate connection, not only between the mythology of India and that of Greece and Italy, but likewise between the legendary stories of the Brahmans and the accounts of certain historical events as recorded in the Old Testament. No doubt, the temptation was great. No one could look down for a moment into the rich mine of religious and mythological lore that was suddenly opened before the eyes of scholars and theologians, without being struck by a host of similarities, not only in the languages, but also in the ancient traditions of the Hindus, the Greeks, and the Romans; and if at that time the Greeks and Romans were still supposed to have borrowed their language and their religion from Jewish quarters, the same conclusion could hardly be avoided with regard to the language and the religion of the Brahmans of India.

The first impulse to look in the ancient religion of India for reminiscences of revealed truth seems to have come from missionaries rather than from scholars. It arose from a motive, in itself most excellent, of finding some common ground for those who wished to convert and those who were to be converted. Only, instead of looking for that common ground where it really was to be found, namely, in the broad foundations on which all religions are built up,—the belief in a divine power, the acknowledgment of sin, the habit of prayer, the desire to offer sacrifice, and the hope of a future life,—the students of Pagan religion as well as Christian missionaries were bent on discovering more striking and more startling coincidences, in order to use them in confirmation of their favorite theory that some rays of a primeval revelation, or some reflection of the Jewish religion, had reached the uttermost ends of the world. This was a dangerous proceeding,—dangerous because superficial, dangerous because undertaken with a foregone conclusion; and very soon the same arguments that had been used on one side in order to prove that all religious truth had been derived from the Old Testament, were turned against Christian scholars and Christian missionaries in order to show that it was not Brahmanism and Buddhism which had borrowed from the Old and New Testament, but that the Old and the New Testament had borrowed from the more ancient religions of the Brahmans and Buddhists.

This argument was carried out, for instance, in Holwell's "Original Principles of the Ancient Brahmans," published in London as early as 1779, in which the author maintains that "the Brahmanic religion is the first and purest product of supernatural revelation," and "that the Hindu scriptures contain to a moral certainty the original doctrines and terms of restoration delivered from God himself, by the mouth of his first-created Birmah, to mankind, at his first creation in the form of man."

Sir William Jones [Asiatic Researches, i. p. 272] tells us that one or two missionaries in India had been absurd enough, in their zeal for the conversion of the Gentiles, to urge "that the Hindus were even now almost Christians, because their Brahma, Vishnu, and Mahesa were no other than the Christian Trinity;" a sentence in which, he adds, we can only doubt whether folly, ignorance, or implety predominates.

Sir William Jones himself was not likely to fall into that error. He speaks against it most emphatically. "Either," he says, "the first eleven chapters of Genesis—all due allowance being made for a figurative Eastern style—are true, or the whole fabric of our national religion is false; a conclusion which none of us, I trust, would wish to be drawn. But it is not the truth of our national religion as such that I have at heart; it is truth itself; and if any cool, unbiased reasoner will clearly convince me that Moses drew his narrative through Egyptian conduits from the primeval fountains of Indian literature, I shall esteem him as a friend for having weeded my mind from a capital error, and promise to stand amongst the foremost in assisting to circulate the truth which he has ascertained."

But though he speaks so strongly against the uncritical proceedings of those who would derive anything that is found in the Old Testament from Indian sources, Sir William Jones was really guilty of the same want of critical caution in his own attempts to identify the gods and heroes of Greece and Rome with the gods and heroes of India. He begins his essay [Asiatic Researches, i. p. 221] "On the Gods of Greece, Italy, and India," with the following remarks:—

"We cannot justly conclude, by arguments proceeding the proof of fact, that one idolatrous people must have borrowed their deities, rites, and tenets from another, since gods of all shapes and dimensions may be framed by the boundless powers of imagination, or by the frauds and follies of men, in countries never connected; but when features of resemblance, too strong to have been accidental, are observable in different systems of polytheism, without fancy or prejudice to color them and improve the likeness, we can scarce help believing that some connection has immemorially subsisted between the several nations who have adopted them. It is my design in this essay to point out such a resemblance between the popular worship of the old Greeks and Italians and that of the Hindus; nor can there be any room to doubt of a great similarity between their strange religions and that of Egypt, China, Persia, Phrygia, Phenicia, and Syria; to which, perhaps, we may safely add some of the southern kingdoms, and even islands of America; while the Gothic system which prevailed in the northern regions of Europe was not merely similar to those of Greece and Italy, but almost the same in another dress, with an embroidery of images apparently Asiatick. From all this, if it be satisfactorily proved, we may infer a general union or affinity between the most distinguished inhabitants of the primitive world at the time when they deviated, as they did too early deviate, from the rational adoration of the only true God."

Here, then, in an essay written nearly a hundred years ago by Sir W. Jones, one of the most celebrated Oriental scholars in England, it might seem as if we should find the first outlines of that science which is looked upon as but of to-day or yesterday,—the outlines of Comparative Mythology. But in such an expectation we are disappointed. What we find is merely a superficial comparison of the mythology of India and that of other nations, both Aryan and Semitic, without any scientific value, because carried out without any of those critical tests which alone keep Comparative Mythology from running riot. This is not intended as casting a slur on Sir W. Jones. At his time the principles which have now been established by the students of the science of language were not yet known, and as with words, so with the names of deities, similarity of sound, the most treacherous of all sirens, was the only guide in such researches.

It is not pleasant to have to find fault with a man possessed of such genius, taste, and learning as Sir W. Jones, but no one who is acquainted with the history of these researches will be surprised at my words. It is the fate of all pioneers, not only to be left behind in the assault which they had planned, but to find that many of their approaches were made in a false direction, and had to be abandoned. And as the authority of their names continues to sway the public at large, and is apt to mislead even painstaking students and to entail upon them repeated disappointments, it is necessary that those who know should speak out, even at the risk of being considered harsh or presumptuous.

A few instances will suffice to show how utterly baseless the comparisons are which Sir W. Jones instituted between the gods of India, Greece, and Italy. He compares the Latin Janus with the Sanskrit deity Ganessa. It is well known that Janus is connected with the same root that has yielded the names of Jupiter, Zeus, and Dyaus, while Ganessa is a compound, meaning lord of hosts, lord of the companies of gods.

Saturnus is supposed to have been the same as Noah, and is then identified by Sir W. Jones with the Indian Manu Satyavrata, who escaped from the flood. Ceres is compared with the goddess Sri, Jupiter or Dispiter with Indra or Divaspati; and, though etymology is called a weak basis for historical inquiries, the three syllables Jov in Jovis, in Zeus, and Siv in Siva are placed side by side, as possibly containing the same root, only differently pronounced. Now the s of Siva is a palatal s, and no scholar who has once looked into a book on comparative philology need be told that such an s could never correspond to a Greek Zeta or a Latin J.

In Krishna, the lovely shepherd-god, Sir W. Jones recognizes the features of Apollo Nomus, who fed the herds of Admetus, and slew the dragon Python; and he leaves it to etymologists to determine whether Gopala, i. e., the cow-herd, may not be the same word as Apollo. We are also assured, on the authority of Colonel Vallancey, that Krishna in Irish means the sun, and that the goddess Kalfi, to whom human sacrifices were offered, as enjoined in the Vedas (?), was the same as Hekate. In conclusion, Sir W. Jones remarks, "I strongly incline to believe that Egyptian priests have actually come from the Nile to the Ganga and Yamuna, and that they visited the Sarmans of India, as the sages of Greece visited them, rather to acquire than to impart knowledge."

The interest that had been excited by Sir William Jones's researches did not subside, though he himself did not return to the subject, but devoted his great powers to more useful labors. Scholars, both in India and in Europe, wanted to know more of the ancient religion of India. If Jupiter, Apollo, and Janus had once been found in the ancient pantheon of the Brahmans; if the account of Noah and the deluge could be traced back to the story of Manu Satyavrata, who escaped from the flood,—more discoveries might be expected in this newly-opened mine, and people rushed to it with all the eagerness of gold-diggers. The idea that everything in India was of extreme antiquity had at that time taken a firm hold on the minds of all students of Sanskrit; and, as there was no one to check their enthusiasm, everything that came to light in Sanskrit literature was readily accepted as more ancient than Homer, or even than the Old Testament. It was under these influences that Lieutenant Wilford, a contemporary of Sir William Jones at Calcutta, took up the thread which Sir William Jones had dropped, and determined at all hazards to solve the question which at that time had excited a world-wide interest. Convinced that the Brahmins possessed in their ancient literature the originals, not only of Greek and Roman mythology, but likewise of the Old Testament history, he tried every possible means to overcome their reserve and reticence. He related to them, as well as he could, the principal stories of classical mythology, and the leading events in the history of the Old Testament; he assured them that they would find the same things in their ancient books, if they would but look for them; he held out the hopes of ample rewards for any extracts from their sacred literature containing the histories of Adam and Eve, of Deukalion and Prometheus; and at last he succeeded. The coyness of the Pandits yielded; the incessant demand created a supply; and for several years essay after essay appeared in the "Asiatic Researches," with extracts from Sanskrit MSS., containing not only the names of Deukalion, Prometheus, and other heroes and deities of Greece, but likewise the names of Adam and Eve, of Abraham and Sarah, and all the rest. Great was the surprise, still greater the joy, not only in Calcutta, but in London, at Paris, and all the universities of Germany. The Sanskrit MSS. from which Lieutenant Wilford quoted, and on which his theories are based, were submitted to Sir W. Jones and other scholars; and though many persons were surprised and for a time even incredulous, yet the fact could not be denied that all was found in these Sanskrit MSS. as stated by Lieutenant Wilford. Sir W. Jones, then President of the Asiatic Society, printed the following declaration at the end of the third volume of the "Asiatic Researches":—

"Since I am persuaded that the learned essay on Egypt and the Nile has afforded you equal delight with that which I have myself received from it, I cannot refrain from endeavoring to increase your satisfaction by confessing openly that I have at length abandoned the greatest part of the natural distrust and incredulity which had taken possession of my mind before I had examined the sources from which our excellent associates, Lieutenant Wilford, has drawn so great a variety of new and interesting opinions. Having lately read again and again, both alone and with a Pandit, the numerous original passages in the Puranas, and other Sanskrit books, which the writer of the dissertation adduces in support of his assertions, I am happy to bear testimony to his perfect good faith and general accuracy, both in his extracts and in the translation of them."

Sir W. Jones then proceeds to give himself a translation of some of these passages. "The following translation," he writes, "of an extract from the Padma-purana is minutely exact":—

- "1. To Satyavarma, the sovereign of the whole earth, were born three sons; the eldest Sherma; then Charma; and thirdly, Jyama.
- "2. They were all men of good morals, excellent in virtue and virtuous deeds, skilled in the use of weapons to strike with or to be thrown, brave men, eager for victory in battle."
- "3. But Satyavarma, being continually delighted with devout meditation, and feeling his sons fit for dominion, laid up in them the burden of government."
- "4. Well-to be remained honoring and satisfying the gods, and priests, and king. One day, by the act of destiny, the king, having drunk mead."
- "5. Became senseless, and lay asleep naked; then was he seen by Charma, and by him were his two brothers called."
- "6. To whom he said, 'What now has befallen? In what state is this our sire? By those two was he hidden with cloths, and called to his senses again and again.'
- "7. Having recovered his intellect, and perfectly knowing what had passed, he cursed Charma, saying, 'Thou shalt be the servant of devils.'
- "8. And hence thou wilt laugh in their presence, from laughter shalt thou acquire a name. Then he gave to Sherma the wide dominion on the south of the snowy mountains."
- "9. And to Jyama he gave all on the north of the snowy mountains; but he, by the power of religious contemplation, obtained supreme bliss."

After this testimony from Sir W. Jones, wrong from him, as it would seem, against his own wish and will, Lieutenant Wilford's essays became more numerous and more startling with every year.

At last, however, the coincidences became too great. The MSS. were again carefully examined; and then it was found that a clever forgery had been committed, that leaves had been inserted in ancient MSS., and that on these leaves the Pandits, urged by Lieutenant Wilford to disclose their ancient mysteries and traditions, had rendered in correct Sanskrit verses all that they had heard about Adam and Abraham from their inquisitive master. Lieutenant (then Colonel) Wilford did not hesitate for one moment to confess publicly that he had been imposed upon; but in the meantime the mischief had been done, his essays had been read all over Europe, they retained their place in the volumes of the "Asiatic Researches," and to the present day some of his statements and theories continue to be quoted authoritatively by writers on ancient religion.

Such accidents, and, one might almost say, such misfortunes, will happen, and it would be extremely unfair were we to use unnecessarily harsh language with regard to those to whom they have happened. It is perfectly true that at present, after the progress that has been made in an accurate and critical study of Sanskrit, it would be unpardonable if any Sanskrit scholar accepted such passages as those translated by Sir W. Jones as genuine. Yet it is by no means certain that a further study of Sanskrit will not lead to similar disenchantments, and deprive many a book in Sanskrit literature, which now is considered as very ancient, of its claims to any high antiquity. Certain portions of the Veda even, which, as far as our knowledge goes at present, we are perfectly justified in referring to the tenth or twelfth century before our era, may some day or other dwindle down from their high estate, and those who have believed in their extreme antiquity will then be held up to blame or ridicule, like Sir W. Jones or Colonel Wilford. This cannot be avoided, for science is progressive, and does not acknowledge, even in the most distinguished scholars, any claims to infallibility. One lesson only may we learn from the disappointment that befell Colonel Wilford, and that is to be on our guard against anything which in ordinary language would be called "too good to be true." Comparative philology has taught us again and again that when we find a word exactly the same in Greek and Sanskrit, we may be certain that it cannot be the same word; and the same applies to Comparative Mythology. The same god or the same hero cannot have exactly the same name in Sanskrit and Greek, for the simple reason that Sanskrit and Greek have deviated from each other, have both followed their own way, have both suffered their own phonetic corruptions; and hence, if they do possess the same word, they can only possess it either in its Greek or its Sanskrit disguise. And if that caution applies to Sanskrit and Greek, members of the same family of language, how much more strongly must it apply to Sanskrit and Hebrew! If the first man were called in Sanskrit Adima, and in Hebrew Adam, and if the two were really the same word, then Hebrew and Sanskrit could not be members of two different families of speech, and we should be driven to admit that Adam was borrowed by the Jews from the Hindus, for it is in Sanskrit only that Adima means the first, whereas in Hebrew it has no such meaning.

These principles and these cautions were hardly thought of in the days of Sir W. Jones and Colonel Wilford, but they ought to be thought of at present. Thus, before Bopp had laid down his code of phonetic laws, and before Burnout had written his works on Buddhism, one cannot be very much surprised that Buddha should have been identified with Minos and Lamech; nay, that even the Babylonian deity Belus, and the Teutonic deity Wotan or Odin, should have been supposed to be connected with the founder of Buddhism in India. But we did not expect that we should have to read again, in a book published in 1869, such statements as these ["Tree and Serpent Worship," by James Fergusson. London: 1868]:—

"There is certainly a much greater similarity between the Buddhism of the Tenses and the Scandinavian mythology than between it and the Buddhism of the books; but still the gulf between the two is immense; and if any traces of the doctrines of the gentle ascetic (Buddha) ever existed in the bosom of Odin or his followers, while dwelling near the roots of the Caucasus, all that can be said is, that they suffered fearful shipwreck among the rocks of the savage superstitions of the north, and sank, never again to appear on the surface of Scandinavian mythology. If the two religions come anywhere in contact, it is at their base, for underlying both has existed a strange substratum of Tree and Serpent Worship; on this the two structures seem to have been raised, though they afterwards diverged into forms so strangely dissimilar." (p. 34.)

Or again (p. 32):—

"We shall probably not err far if we regard these traces of Serpent Worship as indicating the presence in the northeast of Scotland of the head of that column of migration, or of propagandism, which, under the myth of Wodenism, we endeavored in a previous chapter to trace from the Caucasus to Scandinavia."

"The arbors under which two of the couples are seated are curious instances of that sort of summer-house which may be found adorning tea-gardens in the neighborhood of London to the present day. It is scarcely like those that make us hesitate before asserting that there could not possibly be any connexion between Buddhism and Wodenism." (p. 140.)

"One of the most tempting nominal similarities connected with this subject is suggested by the name of Maya. The mother of Buddha was called Maya. The mother of Mercury was also Mala, the daughter of Atlas. The Romans always called Wodin, Mercury, and dies Mercurii and Wodenaday alike denoted the fourth-day of the week. These and other similarities have been frequently pointed out and inelated upon, and they are too numerous and too distinct not to have some foundation in reality." (p. 160, note.)

Statements like these cannot be allowed to pass unnoticed or uncontradicted, particularly if supported by the authority of a great name; and after having spoken so freely of the unscientific character of the mythological comparison instituted by scholars like Sir William Jones and Lieutenant Wilford, who can no longer defend themselves, it would be mere cowardice to shrink from performing the same unpleasant duty in the case of a living writer, who has shown that he knows how to wield the weapons both of defence and attack.

It is perfectly true that the mother of Buddha was called Maya, but it is equally true that the Sanskrit Maya cannot be the Greek Mala. It is quite true also that the fourth day of the week is called dies Mercurii in Latin, and Wednesday in English; nay, that in Sanskrit the same day is called Budha-dina or Budh-vara. But the origin of all these names falls within perfectly historical times, and can throw no light whatever on the early growth of mythology and religion.

First of all, we have to distinguish between Budha and Buddha. The two names, though so like each other, and therefore constantly mistaken one for the other, have nothing in common but their root. Budha with two d's, is the participle of budh, and means awakened, enlightened. [See Buddhaghosha's "Parables," translated by Captain Rogers, which an introduction containing Buddha's "Dhammapadam," translated from Pali, by M. M., 1870, p. 110, note.] It is the name given to those who have reached the highest stage of human wisdom, and it is known most generally as the title of Gotama, Sākya-muni, the founder of Buddhism, whose era dates from 543 B. C. Buddha, on the contrary, with one d, means simply knowing, and it became in later times, when the Hindus received from the Greeks a knowledge of the planets, the name of the planet Mercury.

It is well known that the names of the seven days of the week are derived from the names of the planets [Hare, "On the Names of the Days of the Week" (Philol. Museum, Nov. 1831); Ideler, "Handbuch der Chronologie," p. 177; Grimm, "Deutsche Mythologie," p. 111], and it is equally well known that in Europe the system of weeks and week-days is comparatively of very modern origin. It was not a Greek, nor a Roman, nor a Hindu, but a Jewish or Chaldean invention. The Sabbath (Sabbata) was known and kept at Rome in the first century B. C., with many superstitious practices. It is mentioned by Horace, Ovid, Tibullus (dies Saturni), Persius, Juvenal. Ovid calls it a day "rebus minus apta gerendis." Augustus (Suet. Aug. c. 78) evidently imagined that the Jews fasted on their Sabbath, for he said, "Not even a Jew keeps the fast of the Sabbath so strictly as I have kept this day." In fact, Josephus (Contra Apion. li. 39) was able to say, that there was no town, Greek or not Greek, where the custom of observing the seventh day had not spread. It is curious that we find the seventh day, the Sabbath, even under its new Pagan name, as dies Saturni or Kronike mentioned by Roman and Greek writers, before the names of the other days of the week made their appearance. Tibullus speaks of the day of Saturn, dies Saturni; Julius Frontinus (under Nerva 96–98) says that Vespasian attacked the Jews on the day of Saturn, die Saturni; and Justin Martyr (died 165) states that Christ was crucified the day before the day of Kronos and appeared to his disciples the day after the day of Kronos. He does not use the names of Friday and Sunday. Sunday, as dies Solis, is mentioned by Justin Martyr (Apolog. i. 67), and by Tertullian (died 220), the usual name of that day amongst Christians being the Lord's-day, dominica or dominus. Clemens of Alexandria (died 220) seems to have been the first who used the names of Wednesday and Friday, Hermis kai Aphroditēs hēmera.

It is generally stated, on the authority of Cassius Dio, that the system of counting by weeks and week-days was first introduced in Egypt, and that at his time, early in the third century, the Romans had adopted it, though but recently. Be this as it may, it would seem that, if Tibullus could use the name of dies Saturni for Saturday, the whole system of week-days must have been settled and known at Rome in his time. Cassius Dio tells us that the names were assigned to each day dia tesserōn, by fours; or by giving the first hour of the week to Saturn, then giving one hour to each planet in succession, till the twenty-fifth hour became again the first of the next day. Both systems lead to the same result, as will be seen from the following table:—

Old High German.	Middle-High German.	Anglo-Saxon.	Old Norse.	Sanskrit.
sunne tag (sunne tag)	sonntag (sonne tag)	sunnor dag (sunne tag)	sunnor dag (sunne tag)	Budh-vāra
monne tag (monne tag)	montag (monne tag)	monnō dag (monne tag)	monnō dag (monne tag)	Budh-vāra
tiwne tag (tiwne tag)	tiwtag (tiwne tag)	tiwō dag (tiwne tag)	tiwō dag (tiwne tag)	Budh-vāra
wedne tag (wedne tag)	wedtag (wedne tag)	wednō dag (wedne tag)	wednō dag (wedne tag)	Budh-vāra
thursne tag (thursne tag)	thursdag (thursne tag)	thursō dag (thursne tag)	thursō dag (thursne tag)	Budh-vāra
friggne tag (friggne tag)	friggdag (friggne tag)	friggō dag (friggne tag)	friggō dag (friggne tag)	Budh-vāra
satne tag (satne tag)	satdag (satne tag)	satō dag (satne tag)	satō dag (satne tag)	Budh-vāra
sunne tag (sunne tag)	sonntag (sunne tag)	sunnor dag (sunne tag)	sunnor dag (sunne tag)	Budh-vāra

After the names of the week-days had once been settled, we have no difficulty in tracing their migration towards the East and towards the West. The Hindus had their own peculiar system of reckoning days and months, but they adopted at a later time the foreign system of counting by weeks of seven days, and assigning a presiding planetary deity to each of the seven days, according to the system described above. As the Indian name of the planet Mercury was Budha, the dies Mercurii was naturally called Budha-vāra, but never Buddha-vāra; and the fact that the mother of Mercury was called Maja, and the mother of Buddha Māyā, could, therefore, have had no bearing whatever on the name assigned to the Indian Wednesday. [Grimm, "Deutsche Mythologie," p. 118, note.] Whether the names of the planets were formed in India independently, or after Greek models, is difficult to settle. The name of Budha, the knowing or the clever, given to the planet Mercury, seems, however, inexplicable except on the latter hypothesis.

Having traced the origin of the Sanskrit name of the dies Mercurii, Budhavāra, let us now see why the Teutonic nations, though perfectly ignorant of Buddhism, called the same day the day of Wodan.

That the Teutonic nations received the names of the week-days from their Greek and Roman neighbors admits of no doubt. For commercial and military arrangements between Romans and Germans some kind of lingua franca must soon have sprung up, and in it the names of the week-days must have found their place. There would have been little difficulty in explaining the meaning of Sunday and Monday to the Germans, but in order to make them understand the meaning of the other names, some explanations must have been given on the nature of the different deities, in order to enable the Germans to find corresponding names in their own language. A Roman would tell his German friend that dies Veneris meant the day of a goddess who represented beauty and love, and on hearing this the German would at once have thought of his own goddess of love, Freyja, and have called the dies Veneris the day of Freyja or Friday. [Ibid., p. 276.]

If Jupiter was described as the god who wields the thunderbolt, his natural representative in German would be Donar [Ibid., p. 151], the Anglo-Saxon Thunor, the Old Norse Thor; and hence the dies Jovis would be called the day of Thor, or Thursday. If the fact that Jupiter was the king of the gods had been mentioned, his proper representative in German would, no doubt, have been Wuotan or Odin. [Ibid., p. 120.] As it was, Wuotan or Odin was chosen as the nearest approach to Mercury, the character which they share in common, and which led to their identification, being most likely their love of travelling through the air [Ibid., pp. 137-148], also their granting wealth and fulfilling the wishes of their worshippers, in which capacity Wuotan is known by the name of Wanach [Ibid., p. 126.] or Wick. We can thus understand how it happened that father and son change places, for while Mercurius is the son of Jupiter, Wuotan is the father of Donar. Mars, the god of war, was identified with the German Tiu or Ziu, a name which, though originally the same as Zeus in Greek or Dyaus in Sanskrit, took a peculiarly national character among the Germans, and became their god of war. [Tacit., Hist. iv. 64: communibus diis et præcipuo deorum Marti gratæ agimus.]

There remained thus only the dies Saturni, the day of Saturn, and whether this was called so in imitation of the Latin name, or after an old German deity of a similar name and character, is a point which for the present we must leave unsettled.

What, however, is not unsettled is this, that if the Germans, in interpreting these names of Roman deities as well as they could, called the dies Mercurii, the same day which the Hindus had called the day of Budha (with one d), their day of Wuotan, this was not because "the doctrines of the gentle ascetic existed in the bosom of Odin or his followers, while dwelling near the roots of the Caucasus," but for very different and much more tangible reasons.

But, apart from all this, by what possible process could Buddha and Odin have ever been brought together in the flesh? In the history of ancient religions, Odin belongs to the same stratum of mythological thought as Dyaus in India, Zeus in Greece, Jupiter in Italy. He was worshipped as the supreme deity during a period long anterior to the age of the Veda and of Homer. His travels in Greece, and even in Tyrkland [Grimm, l. c. p. 148], and his half-historical character as a mere hero and a leader of his people, are the result of the latest Euhemerism. Buddha, on the contrary, is not a mythological, but a personal and historical character, and to think of a meeting of Buddha and Odin, or even of their respective descendants, at the roots of Mount Caucasus, would be like imagining an interview between Cyrus and Odin, between Mohammed and Aphrodite.

A comparative study of ancient religions and mythologies, as will be seen from these instances, is not a subject to be taken up lightly. It requires not only an accurate acquaintance with the minutest details of comparative philology, but a knowledge of the history of religions which can hardly be gained without a study of original documents. As long, however, as researches of this kind are carried on for their own sake, and from a mere desire of discovering truth, without any ulterior objects, they deserve no blame, though, for a time, they may lead to erroneous results. But when coincidences between different religions and mythologies are searched out simply in support of preconceived theories, whether by the friends or enemies of true religion, the sense of truth, the very life of all science, is sacrificed, and serious mischief will follow without fail. Here we have a right, not only to protest, but to blame. There is on this account a great difference between the books we have hitherto examined, and a work lately published in Paris by M. Jaccoliot, under the sensational title of "La Bible dans l'Inde, Vie de Jeseus Christina." If this book had been written with the pure enthusiasm of Lieutenant Wilford, it might have been passed by as a mere anachronism. But when one sees how its author shuts his eyes against all evidence that would tell against him, and brings together, without any critical scruples, whatever seems to support his theory that Christianity is a mere copy of the ancient religion of India, mere silence would not be a sufficient answer. Besides, the book has lately been translated into English, and will be read, no doubt, by many people who cannot test the evidence on which it professes to be founded. We learn that M. Jaccoliot was some years ago appointed President of the Court of Justice at Chandernagore, and that he devoted the leisure left him from the duties of his position to studying Sanskrit and the holy books of the Hindus. He is said to have put himself in communication with the Brahmins, who had obtained access to a great number of MSS. carefully stored up in the depths of the pagodas. "The purport of his book is" (I quote from a friendly critic), "that our civilization, our religion, our legends, our gods, have come to us from India, after passing in succession through Egypt, Persia, Judea, Greece, and Italy." This statement, we are told, is not confined to M. Jaccoliot, but has been admitted by almost all Oriental scholars. The Old and New Testaments are found again in the Vedas, and the texts quoted by M. Jaccoliot in support of his theory are said to leave it without doubt. Brahma created Adima (in Sanskrit, the first man) and gave him for companion Heva (in Sanskrit, that which completes life). He appointed the island of Ceylon for their residence. What follows afterwards is so beautifully described that I may be pardoned for quoting it. Only I must warn my readers, lest the extract should leave too deep an impression on their memory, that what M. Jaccoliot calls a simple translation from Sanskrit is, as far as I can judge, a simple invention of some slightly mischievous Brahmin, who, like the Pandits of Lieutenant Wilford, took advantage of the zeal and credulity of a French judge:

"Having created the Man and the Woman (simultaneously, not one after the other), and animated them with the divine afflatus—the Lord said unto them: 'Behold, your mission is to people this beautiful island (Ceylon), where I have gathered together everything pleasant and useful for your subsistence—the rest of the Earth is as yet uninhabitable, but should your progeny so increase as to render the bounds of paradise too narrow for a habitation, let them inquire of me by sacrifice, and I will make known my will.'"

"And thus saying, disappeared."

"Then Adam and Eva dwelt together for a time in perfect happiness; but ere long a vague disquietude began to creep upon them. . . . The Spirit of Evil, jealous of their felicity and of the work of Brahma, inspired them with disturbing thoughts:—'Let us wander through the island,' said Adam to his companion, 'and see if we may not find some part even more beautiful than this.'"

"And they wandered on. . . ."

"Arriving at last at the extremity of the island, they beheld a smooth and narrow arm of the sea, and beyond it a vast and apparently boundless country, connected with their island only by a narrow and rocky pathway arising from the bosom of the waters."

"The two wanderers stood amazed: the country before them was covered with stately trees, birds of a thousand colors flitting amidst their foliage."

"Behold, what beautiful things!" cried Adam, "and what good fruit such trees must produce! . . . let us go and taste them, and if that country is better than this, we will dwell there."

"The trembling, besought Adam to do nothing that might irritate the Lord against them. 'Are we not well here? Have we not pure water and delicious fruit? Wherefore seek other things?'"

"True," replied Adam, "but we will return; what harm can it be to visit this unknown country that presents itself to our view?"

"And as he approached the rocks, Eva, trembling, followed."

"Placing his wife upon his shoulders, he proceeded to cross the space that separated him from the object of his desire, but no sooner did he touch the shore, than trees, flowers, fruits, birds, all that they had perceived from the opposite side, in an instant vanished amidst terrific clamors: . . . the rocks upon which they had crossed sank beneath the waters, a few sharp peaks alone remaining above the surface, to indicate the place of the bridge which had been destroyed by divine displeasure."

"The vegetation which they had seen from the opposite shore was but a delusive mirage raised by the spirit of Evil to tempt them to disobedience."

"Adam fell, weeping, upon the naked sands, . . . but Eva, throwing herself into his arms, besought him not to despair. . . . 'let us rather pray to the Author of all things to pardon us.'"

"And as she spoke, there came a voice from the clouds, saying:—"

"Woman! thou hast only sinned from love to thy husband, whom I commanded thee to love, and thou hast hoped in me."

"I therefore pardon thee—and I pardon him also for thy sake: . . . but ye may no more return to paradise with him. I have created for your habitation . . . through your disobedience to my command the Spirit of Evil has obtained possession of the Earth. . . . Your children reduced to labor and to suffer by your fault will become corrupt and forget me."

"But I will send Vishnu, who will be born of a woman, and who will bring to all the hope of a reward in another life, and the means by prayer of softening their sufferings."

The translator from whom I have quoted exclaims at the end, as well he might:—

"What grandeur and what simplicity in this Hindu legend! and at the same time how so fully logical! . . . Behold here the veritable Eve—the true woman."

But much more extraordinary things are quoted by M. Jaccoliot, from the Vedas and the commentaries. In one passage of the Veda we are told that the ancient poet exclaimed:—

"La femme est l'âme de l'humanité."

On page 63 we read that Manu, Minos, and Manes had the same name as Moses; on page 73, the Brahmins, who invaded India, are represented as the successors of a great reformer called Christna. The name of Zoroaster is derived from the Sanskrit Saryastara (p. 110), meaning 'he who spreads the worship of the Sun.' After it has been laid down (p. 116) that Hebrew was derived from Sanskrit, we are assured that there is little difficulty in deriving Jehova from Zeus. [p. 125, "Pour quiconque s'est occupé d'études philologiques, Jehova dérivé de Zeus est facile à admettre."] Zeus, Jeseus, Jesus, and Isis are all declared to be the same name, and later on (p. 130) we learn that "at present the Brahmins who officiate in the pagodas and temples give this title of Jeseus, i. e. the pure essence, the divine emanation, to Christna only, who alone is recognized as the Word, the truly incarnated, by the worshippers of Vishnu and the free thinkers among the Brahmins."

We are assured that the Apostles, the poor fishermen of Galilee, were able to read the Veda (p. 356); and it was their greatest merit that they did not reject the miraculous accounts of the Vedic period, because the world was not yet ripe for freedom of thought. Kristna, or Christna, we read on p. 360, signified in Sanskrit, sent by God, promised by God, holy; and as the name of Christ or Christos is not Hebrew, whence could it

[Concluded on Page 863.]

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at ODEON HALL, St. Clair Street, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

CASH RECEIPTS.

For the week ending November 2.—Pardon Armington, $13; Harvey Ray, $9.91; J. H. York, $18; C. H. Henshaw, $28; T. L. Smith, $8; Miss Emily Buck, $3; L. Adams, $5; C. T. H. Callahan, $1; Robert Ormiston, $3; U. Koon, $3; H. E. Brown, $1.51; J. A. Gager, $5; R. A. Gough, 10 cts.; C. K. Woodard, $10.35; Cline A. Schofield, $5; Geo. Hendrix, $10; Benj. H. Tucker, $10; Mrs. C. A. Tucker, $10; Fred. Dick Coffin, $10; Chas. H. Coffin, $10; John A. Hawes, $20; Henry A. Dean, $10; Geo. W. Molnar, $4; Henry Miller, $5; J. J. Nichols, $3; Morris Altman, $10; J. T. Sutton, $3; John Trenbath, $3; Chas. T. Fowler, $1; John A. Hawes, $3; Dan W. Treadwell, $2; J. Childs, $3; J. A. Thie, $4; Mrs. Timothy Emerson, $3; J. H. Emers, $3; J. A. Childs, $2; Wm. Archibald, $3; D. A. Lydard, $3; Miles Boyer, $3; Samuel Lydard, $3; N. J. Synthes, $3; Joseph R. Cook, $3; George Johnson, $3; D. B. Morison, $3; Chas. Pitt, $3; S. Newell Hamilton, $3; James B. Bryson, $10; Edward S. Ieman, $2; W. K. Finley, 10 cts.; Ernst Pruessing, $1; C. Cook, $150.00; S. W. Pope, $2 cts.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be ordered to be filled to the same amount without further notice.

N. B.—THE INDEX is payable in advance. Its friends should not be offended if the paper is stopped at the expiration of their terms as indicated by the mail-tag. We have no means of knowing whether they wish it continued or not except by the receipt or non-receipt of the subscription price.

N. B.—Please examine the ADDRESS and DATE on your INDEX mail-tag, and report at once any error in either.

N. B.—If your INDEX mail-tag is not changed within three weeks after renewing your subscription, please notify us immediately. But do not write before the expiration of that time.

N. B.—Postage on THE INDEX is five cents per quarter, dating from receipt of the first number, payable in advance at the place of delivery.

N. B.—In case of any error in your mail tag, always state the post-office at which the paper is received, and also the name just as it is now printed. Then state any desired correction.

N. B.—Please remit by post-office money order, by registered letter, or by draft on New York. Cheques on inferior banks are liable to discount, and the term of subscription will be proportionally shortened in the credit.

N. B.—When writing about a former remittance, always give the date of such remittance as exactly as possible.

RECEIVED.

ORIENTAL RELIGIONS, AND THE RELATION TO UNIVERSAL RELIGION. BY SAMUEL JOHNSON. India. Boston: JAMES K. OSGOOD & Co. 1874. 2vo. pp. 302. $5.00.

THE FORMS OF WATER IN CLOUDS AND RIVERS, ICE AND GLACIERS. BY JOHN TYNDALL, LL. D., F. R. S., & F. R. G. S. With thirty-five illustrations drawn and engraved under the direction of the Author. New York: D. APPLETON & Co., 549 and 51 Broadway. 1872. 12mo. pp. 12.

THE PLAIN. A Tale. By J. FENIMORE COOPER. Illustrated by Drawings by F. O. C. DARLEY. New York: D. APPLETON & Co. Paper. pp. 180.

THE DEATH OF RIFON ON THE PHYSICAL RESURRECTION OF JESUS, IN ITS BEARING ON THE TRUTH OF CHRISTIANITY. BY THOMAS SCOTT.—SPIRITUAL PANTHEISM. BY F. H. J.—COMMUNION WITH GOD. BY THOMAS LUXEMBURG STRANGE.—All published by THOMAS SCOTT, No. 11, The Terrace, Parkgate Road, Upper Norwood, London, S. E.

THE HERALD OF HEALTH for November, 1874. New York: WOOD & HOLBROOK, 15 & 15½ Laight St. $4.00 a year.

OUR NEXT PRESIDENT.—HORACE UNREVELLED'S MARCH: and WHEN THE LIGHT WAVE REFLING PLAYS. Music published by HORACE WATERS, 451 Broadway, New York.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.
CAPITAL, $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.
The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 26, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED elsewhere, Seven Hundred and Fifty Shares, $75,000

JOHN J. STEVENS, Oswego, N. Y.,	One	Share	100
C. D. B. MILES, Syracuse, "	"	"	100
J. HENRY CLARK, "	"	"	100
E. B. WALDO, "	"	"	100
G. N. STEADY, "	"	"	100
JOHN M. RICE, "	"	"	100
MARSHALL BROS., Minneapolis, Minn.,	"	"	100
S. LYDIARD, Long Lake, "	"	"	100
J. G. RICHARDSON, Lake City, "	"	"	100
DR. D. K. BOUTWELL, "	"	"	100
R. S. GUNSHAW, Minneapolis, Minn.,	"	"	100
MRS. E. CHURCH, Portage City, Wis.,	"	"	100
WM. H. ELLERY, Burlington, Iowa,	"	"	100
LYMAN T. OSBORN, Auburn, N. Y.,	"	"	100
P. C. TURNER, Albany, "	"	"	100
M. SCHLESINGER, "	"	"	100
JOSEPH KNIGHT, Troy, "	"	"	100
L. S. BRYANT, Dayton, Ohio,	"	"	100
L. P. GARDNER, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.,	"	"	100
J. C. CHATTERTON, Rutherford Park, N. J.,	"	"	100
W. J. LEWIS, Ill.,	"	"	100
HARVEY HAKES, "	"	"	100
THOS. BROWN, Worcester, Mass.,	"	"	100
C. W. ESTERHILL, "	"	"	100
E. B. LORING, Boston, "	"	"	100
JUSTIN KIDGLEY, "	"	"	100
A. FOLSON, (in trust), "	Five	Shares	500
JOHN WETHERS, "	Three	"	300
F. A. GREENE, "	One	"	100
E. S. DUNHAM, "	Two	"	200
N. CUMMINGS, "	One	"	100
CULPE. T. HOW, "	Three	"	300
GEO. H. FOSTER, "	One	"	100
A. A. KNIGHT, "	"	"	100
GARDNER MURPHY, "	"	"	100
GEORGE HENSHAW, "	"	"	100
HENRY N. STONE, "	"	"	100
H. E. MARY, Fond du Lac, Wis.,	"	"	100
GODFREY GUNDRUM, Ionia, Mich.,	"	"	100
F. H. HENSHAW, Boston, Mass.,	One	"	100
W. C. GANNETT, "	Two	"	200
MRS. K. G. WELLS, "	One	"	100
OSCAR ROOS, Taylor's Falls, Minn.,	"	"	100
J. D. ZIMMERMAN, Union City, Mich.,	"	"	100
FRANK A. ZIMMERMAN, "	"	"	100
J. GEORGE HUBBARD, "	"	"	100
S. H. NTE, "	"	"	100
CHAS. H. SPRING, "	"	"	100
D. D. W. ROGERS, "	"	"	100
G. K. WITHINGTON, Cincinnati, O.,	"	"	100
JOSEPH WATSON, Tusculum, Pa.,	"	"	100
MORRIS EINHORN, "	"	"	100
MRS. J. W. COOK, Ravenna, O.,	"	"	100
F. W. COOK, Evansville, Ind.,	Two	"	200
MRS. J. J. PHILLIP, "	One	"	100
MARY SHANNON, Newton, Mass.,	Four	"	400
MARY C. S. ANTON, "	One	"	100
R. L. BAKER, Ft. Fairfield, Me.,	"	"	100
J. F. FRASER, St. Louis, Mo.,	"	"	100
E. G. WINDGROVER, "	"	"	100
D. R. SPARKS, Alton, Ill.,	"	"	100
WESLEY BERT, Litchfield, "	"	"	100
D. THORNE, New York, N. Y.,	"	"	100
LEWIS G. JONES, "	"	"	100
M. B. BRYANT, "	Two	"	200
JOHN W. CHADWICK, Brooklyn, "	One	"	100
E. S. DUNHAM, Boston, Mass.,	Two	"	200
ISAAC ALLEN, "	Three	"	300
CHAS. LEVIE, Richmond, Ind.,	One	"	100
GEO. C. DUNHAM, Dayton, Ohio,	"	"	100
CHRIS. A. DAY, Olneyville, R. I.,	"	"	100
GEO. LEWIN, Providence, "	"	"	100
J. D. FRONT, "	"	"	100
CLARK JILLSON, Worcester, Mass.,	"	"	100
A. E. CHURCH, Valley Falls, R. I.,	"	"	100
G. K. WITHINGTON, Cincinnati, Ohio,	"	"	100
R. P. PUTNAM, North Platte, Neb.,	Two	"	200
A. BATE, Cincinnati, Ohio, One	"	"	100
D. E. WARE, Boston, Mass.,	"	"	100
FRANCIS ALGER, "	Three	"	300
DANIEL F. CHILDS, "	"	"	100
CHAS. RICHARDSON, "	One	"	100
MRS. J. WILSON, Cambridge, "	Two	"	200
A. W. STEVENS, Toledo, Ohio, One	"	"	100
J. W. SULLINGS, New Bedford, Mass.,	Two	"	200
J. C. DELANO, "	One	"	100
G. A. BOURNE, "	"	"	100
W. C. MACY, "	"	"	100
MRS. B. CUMMINGS, "	"	"	100
MISS MARY GIFFORD, "	"	"	100
BENJ. H. TUCKER, "	"	"	100
FREDERICK COFFIN, "	"	"	100
CHAS. H. COFFIN, "	"	"	100
J. F. MATTHEW, "	"	"	100
MRS. A. ROBINSON, "	"	"	100
C. H. PIERCE, "	"	"	100
MRS. C. A. TUCKER, "	"	"	100
JAMES M. ALDRICH, Fall River, "	"	"	100
R. S. HAKER, Newport, R. I.,	"	"	100
J. B. BRAYTON, "	"	"	100
JOSEPH B. WEAVER, "	"	"	100
JOHN A. HAWES, Fairhaven, Mass.,	Two	"	200
J. J. NICHOLS, New York, N. Y.,	Three	"	300
JOHN W. BIGLOW, "	Five	"	500
E. NAUMBERG, "	"	"	100
MORRIS ALTMAN, "	One	"	100
H. A. R. MOON, "	Ten	"	1,000
ARNOLD SAWYER, "	One	"	100
A. M. LEE, "	"	"	100
FARDON ARMINGTON, Lawrence, Mass.,	"	"	100
MRS. H. E. PERKINS, Dover, N. H.,	"	"	100
MISS EMILY BUCK, New York, N. Y.,	"	"	100
J. GOLDMARK, "	"	"	100
A. M. HOWLAND, Boston, Mass.,	Five	"	500
CHAS. A. GURLEY, Polaski, N. Y.,	Two	"	200
ALEX COCHRAN, Franklin, Pa.,	Five	"	500

$92,400

"He who cannot feel the humanity of his neighbor because he is different from himself in education, habits, opinions, morals, circumstances, objects, is unfit, if not unworthy, to aid him." [Robert Falconer, page 374.]

Seek for peace only in self-identification with the universal order.

The Index.

NOVEMBER 9, 1872.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

BUSINESS NOTICE.—All communications without exception, on all matters pertaining to the paper, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, DRAWER 88, TOLEDO, OHIO." All cheques, drafts, and post office money orders, should be made payable to "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION." No responsibility is assumed for loss of money or neglect in the fulfilment of orders, unless these directions are STRICTLY COMPLIED WITH.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The INDEX will be enlarged to sixteen pages at the commencement of its fourth volume, Jan. 1, 1873. After Sept. 28, 1872, the price of subscription will be $3.00 a year in advance. But every subscriber, new or old, who remits $3.00 at once will be credited with a year's subscription from Jan. 1, and will meantime receive the paper free, if not already paid for.

FREE RELIGION AND SOCIAL REFORM.

What is the great patent fact of human society?

A world full of men and women, all enjoying much, yet all suffering more or less by reason of ignorance, selfishness, and consequent unhappy conditions in themselves and in their relations to each other and to external Nature.

What is the great object of all social reform?

The amelioration and perfection of human life by human means here and now, and the prevention of all preventible evils by the removal of their causes.

What is the best and most effective method of securing social reform?

Three chief answers are offered to this question.

Christianity practically gives up the problem as insoluble. It regards man as incapable of self-rescue from his miseries, which it declares to be the inevitable result of his "depraved and ruined nature." All his efforts to raise himself out of his present condition it discourages, and exhorts him to rely on salvation from above. Until his nature has become "regenerated" by supernatural influences, it declares that no real reform is possible; and, while it zealously devotes itself to the regeneration of man as far as possible, it postpones the very hope of universal social reform to another world, in which the obdurate shall be banished to a realm of evil unalloyed, and the righteous shall be gathered together in the "kingdom of heaven." The futility of all merely human efforts to reform society here and now, the certainty that a large proportion of mankind are irredeemable, the necessity of waiting wholly on supernatural grace for the redemption of "such as shall be saved;" and the postponement of all hope of a thoroughly reformed society to another life than the present one, in which the refuse of the race shall be sifted out for destruction, and the "faithful" shall be alone preserved,—these are cardinal points of Christianity as an historical power; and they have necessarily led to the adoption of the one great means of all such reform as Christianity considers possible; namely, the social institution of the Church.

To the increase and growth of the Church, therefore, Christianity from the beginning has directed all the reformatory aspiration, enthusiasm, and energies of its followers; and whoever carefully studies the relation of the Church to the great secular reforms of modern times will perceive the jealousy, unfriendliness, and even open hostility with which it regards them. All the reformatory movements set on foot from time to time by the Church look exclusively to its own growth and prosperity, as after all the only possible germ of a reformed society; and all these various movements (Foreign and Home Missions, Bible and Tract Societies, Young Men's Christian Associations, and so forth) it sustains and supports solely as feeders to itself. To the question, therefore, concerning the best and most effective method of social reform, Christianity returns answer by a single word—THE CHURCH. Every one, however, who believes in social reform as we have above defined it, and who devotes himself to the practical task of carrying it out, will sooner or later discover that the most formidable obstacle he has to encounter is this professedly reformatory institution of the Christian Church. The modern reformer believes in the amelioration of human society here and now, and by natural human means. But this belief the Church denounces as heresy; the attempt to carry it into practice it opposes as irreligious and anti-Christian. The Encyclical Letter and Syllabus of Pius IX. are but the bold denunciation and defiance of what Protestant Evangelicalism furtively, irresolutely, and feebly works against; namely, liberty, science, and civilization. It is perfectly true that many excellent adherents of secular reforms have been nominally Christians; but none the less is it true that, in favoring secular reform, they have fought against the very spirit of Christianity itself. The same religion which made Paul silent and acquiescent before the system of human slavery tends everywhere to make Christians silent and acquiescent before all other great secular evils. It is no accident that this is so. The innermost genius of the Christian gospel utters itself in the fact. All secular reform is paralyzed by this mighty, invisible, omnipresent influence of Christianity, which deadens the public heart to the appeals of reformers, blinds the public mind to the truth and evident bearings of their facts, and benumbs the public conscience before evils that are guilt and shame no less than immeasurable misery. The day is at hand when this truth will be entered among the commonplaces of social science. The entire system of Christian ideas is irreconcilable with secular social reform; the spirit of the Christian gospel is hostile to it; the institution of the Christian Church stands as the greatest obstacle and stumbling-block in its pathway. We say this without bitterness, simply as a physician makes the diagnosis of a dangerous disease. If the patient grows angry and unreasonable, is the physician at fault?

Few persons are aware how large an amount of money is invested, and how much more is annually spent, in the Christian Church of the United States. The statistics of religion, based on the just completed Report of the Census Office at Washington, show that on the first of June, 1870, the number of church edifices in this country was 63,074; and that the total valuation of church property was $354,429,581. This vast sum is wholly unproductive, except so far as the support and propagation of the Christian gospel is concerned. At eight per cent., the interest upon it would be annually $28,354,366.48; and this sum, therefore, may be taken as an approximation to the amount of money annually devoted to the simple provision of church accommodations. Furthermore, the total number of church edifices being at the above date 63,074, of which probably 60,000 at least sustain regular Sunday services, it would seem to be a low estimate to put the average cost of sustaining them at $500 a year, including the minister's salary, the cost of the choir, of fuel, of light, and the other miscellaneous items of church expense. This would involve a total annual outlay of $30,000,000 more. If to these amounts be added (say) $5,000,000 to cover the annual receipts of Missionary, Bible, Tract, and other societies devoted to purposes of direct or indirect propagandism, we shall then have a total of over $63,000,000 expended every year by the people of the United States alone in the propagation of the Christian gospel. This is, of course, a mere approximation; but we believe that it is less than the actual figures, could they be exactly known.

And yet, as we have seen, the influence of that Christian gospel which requires so vast a yearly expenditure is thrown directly against all efforts to reform the existing evils of society by purely natural methods. It is true that many Christians, clergy and laity alike, are actively interested and participant in these efforts; but the general result of their interference is to embarrass and impede the progress of strictly secular reform. They did more harm than good on the whole, as the "old abolitionists" will testify, to the anti-slavery reform; they believed in the Church as the proper instrumentality of reform, and squandered time, strength, and zeal in the endeavor to make it such. Apart, however, from the comparatively small minority of earnestly Christian reformers, the vast body of Christian believers constituted the mightiest bulwark of the slave-system. It was the Bible defence of this system that made it almost impregnable, by entrenching it behind the perverted moral sense of the community. So has it been, so will it be, with every other secular reform. The Church not only opposes directly and vigorously the attempt to reform society by purely human means, but drains off the community's finest enthusiasm, best energies, most consecrated purpose, and chief resources in money and men, to the pseudo-reform of Christian propagandism. Nay, more. It not only actually blocks the way as society advances to work out independently its own reformation, but it even refuses to bear its equal share of the burden in supporting society as it now is; for it has secured the total exemption of its own vast property from taxation, obliges non-ecclesiastical property to pay all the expenses of protecting it, and thus directly taxes the people for the maintenance of Christianity. Yet the people fancy they have no State religion, not perceiving that they have to pay largely out of their own pockets towards the support of what is practically, though not legally, the Established Religion of the United States. Not until the Church has become a memory of the past will mankind discover how heavy a load they so unsuspectingly bore in climbing the steep hill of reform. Not until then will they discover that, when Christianity proposes to reform the world by means of the Church, it gives up secular reform altogether, and works for only such reform as shall be finally realized after the Day of Judgment. Its method on this earth is a failure.

The subject grows upon our hands, and cannot be compressed into the limits originally designed. Its great importance renders any apology for its continuation unnecessary, and we shall resume it next week.

MAX MÜLLER.

Professor Max Müller, of Oxford, England, the distinguished Sanskrit scholar and author of "Chips from a German Workshop," "The Science of Religion," and so forth, has favored us with an exceedingly interesting letter for publication, which will appear in the first issue of the enlarged INDEX. From this letter we quote at present only the following passage:—

"That the want of a journal devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America,—that such a journal should have been started and powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany, though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large."

Professor Müller at the same time forwarded for our use the very valuable paper republished on the first pages of our present issue, which will undoubtedly be new to our readers. It was meant, as he writes us, "chiefly to inculcate caution in the treatment of ancient religions;" and that this caution is needed will be admitted by every one who has observed the credulous reception given by many radicals to the recent book by M. Jacolliot, entitled "The Bible in India." Not only is the cause of good learning seriously injured by such ill-considered books, but they confirm false views of the philosophy of religion in general, and propagate a shallow and misleading method in studying the mutual relations of the great religions of the world. It is as superstitious to suppose that Christendom owes its religion to India as to Palestine: the real religion of the human soul is everywhere indigenous, and neither nations nor individuals borrow from each other more than a few of its most superficial characteristics. Neither the Ganges nor the Jordan is the fountain-head of all waters; in every land are found pure springs, and, if you will but dig deep enough, a good well may be sunk even in your own backyard.

"The question of the authenticity of the Bible is settled," says the Toledo Commercial. Agreed. But does the Commercial know which way it is settled?

SPECIAL NOTICE.

F. R. A. CONVENTIONS.

The Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association have arranged for holding two Conventions, as follows:—

In New York, beginning Tuesday evening, November 19, and continuing through Wednesday, the 20th.

In Philadelphia, beginning Thursday evening, November 21, and continuing through Friday, the 22d.

The attention of all friends of the Association in those cities and vicinity, as also of all who desire to hear and know the principles and purposes of the Association, is called to this notice. Live subjects will be presented for discussion, and distinguished speakers will be in attendance. Further particulars, with regard to speakers and the Halls and hours of meeting, will be given in the local papers.

WM. J. POTTER,

Secretary F. R. A.

[A telegram from Mr. Potter, received since the above was in type, announces that there may possibly be a change in the dates of the Conventions.—Ed.]

PROF. TYNDALL'S LECTURES.

The interest in Mr. Tyndall's lectures in Boston continued undiminished to the close. In spite of the difficulty of obtaining tickets, by a process of "natural selection" those who most earnestly desire to hear any lectures generally get there at last; and so the audience in this case was composed of attentive and highly interested auditors who seemed best pleased with the most thorough and careful analysis of the subjects presented.

But, aside from the great scientific interest of Prof. Tyndall's lectures, one could not fail to observe his broad, liberal spirit, and the desire he felt to waken in his audience a love of truth for its own sake, and a respect for those original observers who devote their lives to the careful investigation of Nature. He evidently took great delight in paying tribute to the comparatively unknown names in science. His genial, lively manner, and his own enjoyment of his subject, gave a charm to the lectures which many would not have believed possible on such abstruse themes.

But Mr. Tyndall has another claim on our interest in his free and broad religious views, as well as in his thorough handling of scientific themes; and it is earnestly hoped that before he leaves the country he will embrace some opportunity of expressing his views in regard to the "queen of sciences."

E. D. C.

JOHNSON'S "ORIENTAL RELIGIONS."

Inquiry is sometimes made, by readers of THE INDEX, for some really good book on the religious faiths of mankind. It is pleasant to have at last one that is really admirable to recommend. We have at length the ripe fruit of long years of scholarly silence, in the first volume of Samuel Johnson's noble work.

The best answer one could make to such inquiries, heretofore, was to recommend Mrs. Child's "Progress of Religious Ideas," or Dr. Clarke's "Ten Great Religions." Both of these were written in a clear and simple style, and both recognized some germs of inspiration in all the great religions. The great trouble was that neither of them could be called a scholarly book, nor was either of them even a record of the most recent scholarship. Mrs. Child's book, though written with special impartiality, was written twenty years ago. But this evil was the greater in Dr. Clarke's book in proportion to its higher claims. It was not so much that the author did not know the Oriental languages, for that is unhappily the general rule among American authors. But even American scholarship implies some knowledge of Greek and Latin, and yet there are no chapters in "Ten Great Religions" which impress the reader with less erudition,—less personal handling of the subject in question,—than those which treat of Greece and Rome. And even in dealing with second-hand sources of knowledge, there needs vigorous effort to keep up with the very latest. The science of Comparative Religion is a very recent study, and it makes a great difference whether you rely on the last authority or the last but half-a-dozen. In Dr. Clarke's chapter on "Buddhism," for instance, the authority especially cited (p. 143) to prove the "athelism" of that religion is a book by Upham, published in 1833, whose utter worthlessness was long since shown by Burnouf and other scholars. [Müller, Chips, I. 181.] Indeed, in his list of authorities on Buddhism (p. 147) Dr. Clarke cites no book printed later than 1868, though his own book did not appear until 1871, and at least four of the very most valuable English works on the subject had appeared in the interval. These are the books of Alabaster, Beal, and Bigandet, with the version of the "Dhammapadam" by Max Müller,—which is confessedly the best Buddhist scripture we yet possess, and in the preface to which the translator revokes the opinion, attributed to him by Dr. Clarke, that "Nirvana" means annihilation.

* ORIENTAL RELIGIONS, AND THEIR RELATION TO UNIVERSAL RELIGION. By SAMUEL JOHNSON. [India.] Boston: J. R. Osgood & Co. 1874. 45.

Again, Dr. Clarke's book suffers by being written in a polemic instead of a judicial spirit, and by its subordination to a preconceived system. This is fairly suggested in its cover and frontispiece, where these great religions appear as so many flies in a cobweb, with Judaism couched in the middle as spider. Throughout the book, each religion is imprisoned and cramped into a narrow corner, and put where Judaism can most conveniently get at it. Each must play the part assigned it, and the writer—thoroughly honest as a man, and only self-deceiving as a theologian—ignores unflinchingly all facts which make against his system. Mohammedanism, in his theory, is a dead faith, and the fact that it is probably making more converts per annum than any other faith on earth is utterly ignored. Its wonderful progress in Asia and Africa is recorded by travellers, year by year; but its place in Dr. Clarke's programme is to represent death, and death it shall be. When will theologians imitate the noble frankness of the scientists—of Darwin, for instance, who looks in the face a fact that would be fatal to his whole theory, and simply says, "Wait! there will be a place for you, also, by and by"?

Dr. Clarke's personal qualities entitle him to so much regard, and his book contains in a compact form so many facts not elsewhere accessible, that there seemed no need to point out these defects until a better book came. Now that Mr. Johnson's work on Oriental Religions has appeared, it is fair to call attention to its immense superiority. This is indeed a book of which an American may speak with pride. It would be scarcely possible, indeed, in the present state of knowledge, for a non-Orientalist to produce a better one. Mr. Johnson himself has to study those religions through translations. But there is a compensation for even this drawback. In the present imperfect state of philology, the acquisition of Oriental languages involves so much labor that we can rarely hope to find in a philologist the depth of religious thought which should go to the discussion of the great religions of mankind. This depth of thought is what Mr. Johnson brings to the task. Without it, his years of study would be almost wasted. It takes more than a grammar or a dictionary to reach the secret of Brahmanism and Buddhism.

It is to these two great religions that the present volume is devoted. Its sub-title is "India." He reviews the history of the primitive Aryans, shows the formation of Brahmanism, gives copious extracts from the Vedic hymns, discusses the Vedanta, the Sankhya system, the Bhagavad-gita; and the influence of these different phases of faith upon laws, social forms, and the position of woman. In the latter half of the book he gives simply the most admirable picture of Buddhism that I have ever had the good fortune to meet; and his chapter on "Nirvana," above all, is a masterpiece of fairness and careful justice.

To come out into these pages from those of Mrs. Child or Dr. Clarke is to come out of a creek into an ocean. If any one wishes a book which shall, as Thoreau wrote of the Bhagavad-gita, "keep him silent for awhile;" if any one desires a book, in short, to shut himself up with for six months, let him take this. They will be six happy months, for the thought and learning are so relieved on every page by graceful fancies and beautiful examples, taken from the wondrous Oriental sources, that there is no dullness, but only delight. And all wish to criticize special points must be merged, for the present, in the general sense of pleasure and obligation.

T. W. H.

THE QUAKERS.

The division of the Quaker Society of this country into two distinct and at the same time bitterly antagonistic bodies, occurred about the year 1827. Curiously enough, and in marked contrast with the experience of other religious associations a revival was the direct cause of the separation; a revival of Quakerism within the organization. The Society was already drifting away from old landmarks; the ship was dragging her anchor, perhaps, but she was surely drifting, when Elias Hicks, a powerful and eloquent, though by no means a well-educated preacher, sounded the alarm.

The cardinal idea of Quakerism is the universality and sufficiency of the Inner Light. Hicks' re-assertion of this principle disclosed the fact that nearly one-half of the Quakers had abandoned it, and in place thereof had substituted the doctrine of the atonement. These people retained the name and are known to-day as Orthodox Quakers; they continue to maintain the testimonies of George Fox against a "hireling ministry," war, amusements, etc.; but every one of them will tell you he not only believes in the infallibility of the Bible, but in the Evangelical interpretation of it, and he applies the Bible test to all revelation that assumes to proceed from the Inner Light, or from any other source. His Orthodoxy is as undoubted as that of the most Evangelical church member. On the other hand, the Hicksite Quaker is true to his traditions and the faith of his fathers. In theory, at least, the voice of God in the soul is for him the all-sufficient guide and teacher. All doctrine, all precept, all books, are brought to this one test.

I do not pretend to claim that these Friends are always faithful to their own logic. In their books of discipline and their First-day schools, they hold members within the limits of Christianity and teach some Christian superstitions which at least one other liberal church has abandoned. The Quaker principle is adhered to, however, to a good degree. From "The Young Friends' Manual," written for the use of First-day schools, I quote a paragraph that indicates the limitations of organized Quakerism, and at the same time forcibly suggests its splendid possibilities. The teacher puts the question, "If this Inward Guide and Teacher, as it is faithfully regarded and obeyed, is all sufficient for our salvation, what place do the Scriptures occupy?" and the reply is:—

"The Scriptures are invaluable in bearing emphatic testimony to this Divine power and principle in the soul of man; in exhibiting the love, mercy, justice, power, wisdom, and goodness of God toward his rational creatures; in furnishing the pure example, heavenly precepts, and righteous works of the blessed Jesus; and in containing the recorded experience of the most devoted servants of God in former ages, which is a way-mark to the traveller Zionward, who will find strength and encouragement from the corroboration of their experience, with the workings of the same spirit in his own heart. The Sermon on the Mount, as contained in the 5th, 6th, and 7th chapters of Matthew, and the 37th, 38th, and 107th Psalms, afford comfort for almost every state. But the Scriptures, although so valuable when rightly regarded and used, will and can do us no good, unless we come to experience in our own hearts that of which they bear witness,—the spirit and power of God. They are, next to a rightly authorized ministry, the best of outward helps, pointing to the above source of true help. The truths they record are not true because they are recorded, but they were recorded because they are true; and a belief in anything of which we can have no corresponding evidence in our own consciousness is not essential to our salvation. Hence all Scripture that can benefit any one is that to which the spirit of God in our hearts bears witness. Having been dictated by this same spirit to the holy men of old, when it 'comes unto its own' in us, 'its own receives it,' and with it receives 'power to become a son of God.' John 1: 12."

I am well aware that the book from which I have here quoted is the work of one individual, and, technically speaking, cannot be referred to as an authority; it is moreover quite possible that the writer might find it difficult to reconcile his views with those laid down in the authoritative "Book of Discipline." But that these views are entertained by a large number of Friends, not nominal members merely, but members of influence and position, every one at all conversant with the subject very well knows. Benjamin Hallowell, the author of the Manual, is a revered elder and an "appointed minister" of the Society. As a matter of fact, there is enough of the spirit of liberty in the organization to ensure great latitude of opinion, and members are free to be Trinitarians or Unitarians, to believe in the atonement or to repudiate it; and, let the Discipline read as it may, it is perfectly well understood that not a few of them are radical Unitarians and are quite as radical as this term indicates, while a smaller number are pronounced "free religionists" and altogether reject the Christian name as well as the authority of Jesus.

Quakerism, however imperfectly its fundamental proposition may have been developed, has indeed always stood for religious freedom. The Free Religious Association reverses the words and advocates the broader and more inclusive idea known as Free Religion. The difference between the principles and purpose of the two organizations is quite apparent; but it is notable that there is far more of sympathy than of antagonism. The logic of the Quaker carries him beyond the limits of Christianity, but holds him to theism. Quakerism cannot include atheism; but, with this exception, it is as democratic, as free and catholic, as the constitution of the Free Religious Association.

I have already hinted that the recognition of this truth is becoming more and more frequent, and the remark is especially applicable to the younger members of the Society. Whether this progressive element remains within the organization to invigorate and to perpetuate its existence, depends largely upon the action of the conservative Friends. Another division is not at all probable. A gradual desertion from the ranks is now in progress, and will stop only with the disintegration of the Society, unless the conservatives who control it speedily recognize the demands of the hour and consent to welcome the fullest development of the doctrine by which almost alone Quakerism has at any time been vindicated. If the Inner Light is all sufficient, why not stand bravely by it? The Society can only save its life by fidelity to this fundamental, vitalizing principle; failing in this, it must die, and cannot die too soon.

R. P. H.

PRAYER—MARTINEAU—SIMONY.

LONDON, Oct. 14, 1872.

The prayer question has assumed imposing dimensions among the liberal preachers of this country. The discussion which the men of science have raised has revealed that for a long time many eminent Unitarians had practically anticipated it, and that anything that would be called prayer in the Orthodox sense has been in a large number of cases dispensed with. There have been little emotional addresses, poetical apostrophes, thanksgivings, and the like; but appeals to God to be good, petitions to the sun to shine, supplications to Supreme Love to be loving, seem to have slipped out of the usage of the valiant youth who in recent years have passed from the sitting at the feet of Martineau at Manchester New College to feed the rationalistic wants of this country. There has been a great deal of writing on the subject, but I desire particularly to call the attention of your readers to the subjoined passages of a letter which has just been published from the pen of Mr. Benjamin Templar, a distinguished school-teacher at Southport. The writer goes directly to the point at which the entire controversy, so far as liberal thinkers are concerned, has arrived; namely, the rectitude of prayer as a reactive influence upon the supplicant. Referring to a remark by the celebrated Dr. Blair, in a sermon "On the Unchangeableness of the Divine Nature," that "the change which our devotions are intended to make is upon ourselves, not upon the Almighty," Mr. Templar says:—

"Let me give a striking illustration of this. Some years ago a ship was overtaken by a terrible storm in the Indian ocean, and sprang a-leak. All on board, passengers included, worked at the pumps till they were exhausted and in despair. The Lascars, of whom the crew chiefly consisted, implored the Captain to let them sacrifice to their duty. For a time he refused, telling them their time would be better spent at the pumps; after awhile, however, he gave the coveted permission: the men ceased pumping, and some precious moments were consumed in sacrificing a cock at the mast-head and offering up prayers. The effect upon the men was magical; they returned to their pumps with renewed energy and the ship was saved. Of course the Lascars were delighted with the result of their prayers and sacrifice, to which they confidently attributed the saving of the ship with all on board. And that was the result; but it resulted not from anything their duty had done, but solely from the effect of their prayers and their sacrifice upon themselves. I hope I shall not offend any one by suggesting that in like manner many a disheartened, wearied man, and many a toiling, hopeful, patient woman, have prayed for strength to carry out their labors of necessity or love, and have risen so refreshed and re-invigorated that they have been able to take up their toilsome task again and carry it through."

"But," it will be urged, 'what will people do it with increased knowledge of God and his mode of government they should become fully convinced of the uselessness of prayer? They will miss all the comfort and stimulus just spoken of, for they will not go through what they feel would be an empty form!' True, they will; but I cannot admit they will therefore need pity, for I believe that when they attain to that clear conception of the mode of God's government which would make them feel prayer to be useless, they will feel such veneration and love for its beneficence, and such a calm, unshaken, unassailable confidence in its permanence as they will feel to be far more precious to them than their lost faith in the efficacy of prayer. They will find that a conviction of the immutability of God's beneficent laws is a far more precious, comforting possession than their old faith in the need and power of prayer, and they will go on their way rejoicing. They will feel there can be no better stimulus to exertion than the certainty that certain effects are in the nature of things sure to follow their efforts, and they will simply exchange their faith in the importunity of asking, for a noble and more useful faith in the importunity of acting."

A great deal of anxiety has been felt that Mr. Martineau should take part in this discussion, but I regret to say there are sad reasons for fearing that he will be unable to do. A short time ago Mr. Martineau was seized with a giddiness, accompanied by other symptoms, which have warned him and his friends that the severe tasks which he has long been imposing upon himself must be suspended. He had just been passing his summer vacation in one of the most beautiful parts of Wales, and his devoted congregation were looking forward to the resumption of his pulpit duties with wonted pleasure. But he has been compelled to suspend them as well as his labors at the Divinity College. It was while he was engaged in preparing a reply to the last paper of Herbert Spencer that he was seized with this trouble, and the article had to be laid aside half-finished. Mr. Martineau's family have good reason to hope that with a suspension of work he will be able to surmount the present attack, and last week he was well enough to visit his College; but the cessation even for a time of such work as that of the greatest preacher in London is nothing less than a public calamity. His Church is the Normal School of reverent free thought in England. He has gathered around him a company of devoted and cultivated young men and women, each of whom is a centre of high influence; and, though his congregation is apparently small when the eminence of the man is considered, it is really large. In a sense it is Martineau that preaches to a score or two of congregations in the country through the minds he has trained and richly furnished. And yet among all these there is no prospect that we could find another Martineau any more than another Theodore Parker.

It may not be generally known in America that such clergymen as Charles Voysey, G. W. Cox, Mr. Wild, and others, are still in holy orders in the National Church. Deprived, as in the case of Mr. Voysey, of his "living," or having resigned it, as in the case of the others mentioned, they still retain their membership in the church and the clerical position. They do this for political reasons. They hope to continue their seige until the nation has a creedless Church and is cleansed of its traditional impurities. I confess that the purification of the stables of King Augustus seems to me a feeble parable for the task to which they have addressed themselves. The English Church has become rooted in the hypocrisy and selfishness of the country to an extent which its most earnest accusers have hardly appreciated. One of the most significant revelations on this subject has lately been made by Mr. J. C. Cox, who has been collecting the advertisements of church brokers. These advertisements are scattered through the country marked "strictly private and confidential." Mr. Cox has found that in the month of September last there were 596 advertisements of livings for sale; for exchange or sale, 99; and there were others for exchange only, making the whole number of livings that may be described as in the market, 1,375. Of these he found that 105 were recommended as having the advantage of "good society,"—the phrase being sometimes "the best society." Fifty-six were recommended for being amidst "picturesque scenery," and in others it was said there was "excellent trout-fishing in the neighborhood." In 11 cases the livings were recommended for the "good shooting" near them, and in 9 it was observed that "the hounds meet" close to them. "No poor residents," "a fine house," "£600 salary" were the advantages of one living—price £8,500. One advertisement mentions that the incumbent is eighty years of age, and can therefore not stand in the way very long, and another "most eligible property" has an incumbent who "is in a very precarious state of health." Immediate offers are requested in a case where the incumbent is eighty-nine. The advantage of another (in Shropshire) is that service is only performed every other Sunday. It is thus apparent that the crime which the Church has branded as simony is going on in a shameless and notorious manner. But our bishops are too busy in prosecuting preachers for heresy to attend to it. The whip of small cords is reserved for any man brave enough to speak the truth in the temple instead of bartering it for money.

M. D. C.

AN UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIAL.

The following spontaneous expression of satisfaction with THE INDEX as an advertising medium has been kindly sent to this office:—

BRONSON, Mich., Nov. 1, 1872.

TO THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, TOLEDO, OHIO:

Gentlemen,—Being engaged in furnishing the philosophical works of Holyoke, Bradlaugh, Watts, Buchner, Tyndall, Darwin, Huxley, Buckle, Spencer, Draper, Lecky, Lubbock, Lewes, and other free thought books that embody the thoughts and opinions of the Salt of the Earth, I can attest to the merits of THE INDEX as an advertising medium, and would cordially commend it to the attention of the advertising fraternity. Yours, etc.,

J. F. RUGGLES,

Dealer in Free Thought Literature and Importer of London Books.

MORE PETITIONS.

Since our last acknowledgment, the following additional lists of signatures to the remonstrance against the Christian Amendment of the United States Constitution have been received:—

Mrs. Catherine A. F. Stebbins, Detroit, Michigan, sends one hundred and forty-five names; Mr. G. G. Sperry, Cortland, New York, twenty-seven; Mr. J. E. Haynes, Staten Island, New York, eleven; Mr. Walter F. Johnson, Iola, Kansas, four; Mr. J. F. Taylor, Garrettsville, Ohio, five; Dr. Titus L. Brown, Binghamton, New York, one hundred and ten.

The total aggregate of names thus far acknowledged in THE INDEX as appended to this remonstrance is 34,380.

"The gods, I believe," wrote Plutarch [Moralia, iv, 359], "enjoy health, but understand fever and pleurisy." And the truly virtuous man understands vice, but pities it.

A CHAPTER OF ACCIDENTS IN COMPARATIVE THEOLOGY.

[Concluded from Page 339.]

have been taken except from Krishna, the son of Devaki, or, as M. Jaccoliot writes, Devanaguy?

It is difficult, nay, almost impossible, to criticize or refute such statements, and yet it is necessary to do so; for such is the interest, or I should rather say the feverish curiosity excited by anything that bears on ancient religion, that M. Jaccoliot's book has produced a very wide and very deep impression. It has been remarked with some surprise that Vedic scholars in Europe had failed to discover these important passages in the Veda which he has pointed out, or, still worse, that they had never brought them to the knowledge of the public. In fact, if anything was wanting to show that a general knowledge of the history of ancient religion ought to form part of our education, it was the panic created by M. Jaccoliot's book. It is simply the story of Lieutenant Wilford over again, only far less excusable now than a hundred years ago, and decidedly reprehensible on account of the author's unscientific basis. Many of the words which M. Jaccoliot quotes as Sanskrit are not Sanskrit at all; others never have the meaning which he assigns to them; and as to the passages from the Vedas (including our old friend the Bhagaveda-gita), they are not from the Veda, they are not from any old Sanskrit writer,—they simply belong to the second half of the nineteenth century. What happened to Lieutenant Wilford has happened again to M. Jaccoliot. He tells us the secret himself:—

"One day," he says (p. 280), "when we were reading the translation of Manu, by Sir W. Jones, a note led us to consult the Indian commentator, Kalka Bhatia, when we found an allusion to the sacrifice of a son by his father prevented by God himself after he had commanded it. We then had only one idea left, namely, to find again in the dark mass of the religious books of the Hindus, the original account of that event. We should never have succeeded but for the 'compliance' of a Brahman with whom we were reading Sanskrit, and who, yielding to our request, brought us from the library of his pagoda the works of the theologian Ramateerth, which have yielded us such precious assistance in this volume."

As to the story of the son offered as a sacrifice by his father, and released at the command of the gods, M. Jaccoliot might have found the original account of it from the Veda, both text and translation, in my "History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature." He would soon have seen that the story of Sushaspa, being sold by his father in order to be sacrificed in the place of an Indian prince, has very little in common with the intended sacrifice of Isaac by Abraham. M. Jaccoliot has, no doubt, found out by this time that he has been imposed upon; and if so, he ought to follow the example of Colonel Wilford, and publicly state what has happened. Even then, I doubt not that his statements will continue to be quoted for a long time, and that Adima and Hera, thus brought to life again, will make their appearance in many a book and many a lecture-room.

Lest it be supposed that such accidents happen to Sanskrit scholars only, or that this fever is bred only in the jungles of Indian mythology, I shall mention at least one more case, which will show that this disease is of a more general character, and that want of caution will produce it in every climate.

Before the discovery of Sanskrit, China had stood for a long time in the place which was afterwards occupied by India. When the ancient literature and civilization of China became first known to the scholars of Europe, the Celestial Empire had its admirers and prophets as full of enthusiasm as Sir W. Jones and Lieutenant Wilford, and there was nothing, whether Greek philosophy or Christian morality, that was not supposed to have had its first origin among the sages of China. The proceedings of the Jesuit missionaries in China were most extraordinary. They had themselves admitted the antiquity of the writings of Confucius and Laotse, both of whom lived in the sixth century B. C. [Stanislas Julien, Le Livre de la Voie et de la Vertu, Paris, 1842, p. iv.] But in their zeal to show that the sacred books of the Chinese contained numerous passages borrowed from the Bible, nay, even some of the dogmas of the later church, they hardly perceived that, taking into account the respective dates of these books, they were really proving that a kind of anticipated Christianity had been accorded to the ancient sages of the Celestial Empire. The most learned advocate of this school was Father Prémare. Another supporter of the same view, Montucci [Montucci, De studiis sinicis, Berolini, 1808], speaking of Laotse's Tao-te-king, says:—

"We find in it so many sayings clearly referring to the true God, that no one who has read this book can doubt that the mystery of the holiest Trinity was revealed to the Chinese more than five centuries before the advent of Christ. Every-thing, therefore, who knows the strong feeling of the Chinese for their own teachers, will admit that nothing more efficient could be found in order to fix the dogmas of the Christian religion in the mind of the Chinese than the demonstration that these dogmas agree with their own books. The study, therefore, and the translation of this elegant book (the Tao-te-king) would prove most useful to the missionaries, in order to bring to a happy issue the desired gathering in of the Apostolic harvest."

What followed is so extraordinary that, though it has often been related, it deserves to be related again, more particularly as the whole problem which was supposed to have been solved once for all by M. Stanislas Julien, has of late been opened again by Dr. von Strauss, in the "Journal of the German Oriental Society," 1869.

There is a passage at the beginning of the fourteenth chapter of the Tao-te-king in which Father Amyot felt certain that the three persons of the Trinity could be recognized. He translated it:—

"He who is as it were visible but cannot be seen is called FAI.
"He whom we cannot hear, and who does not speak to our ear, is called HI.
"He who is as it were tangible, but cannot be touched, is called WEI."

Few readers, I believe, would have been much startled by this passage, or would have seen in it what Father Amyot saw. But more startling revelations were in store. The most celebrated Chinese scholar of his time, Abel Rémusat, took up the subject; and after showing that the first of the three names had to be pronounced, not Khi, but I, he maintained that the three syllables, I Hi Wei, were meant for Je-ho-vah. According to him, the three characters employed in this name have no meaning in Chinese; they are only signs of sounds foreign to the Chinese language; and they were intended to render the Greek Iao, the name which, according to Diodorus Siculus, the Jews gave to their God. Rémusat goes on to remark that Laotse had really rendered this Hebrew name more accurately than the Greeks, because he had preserved the aspiration of the second syllable which was lost in Greek. In fact, he entertains no doubt that this word, occurring in the work of Laotse, proves an intellectual communication between the West and China, in the sixth century B. C.

Fortunately, the panic created by this discovery did not last long. M. Stanislas Julien published in 1842 a complete translation of this difficult book; and here all traces of the name of Jehovah have disappeared.

"The three syllables," he writes, "which Abel Rémusat considered as purely phonetic and foreign to the Chinese language, have a very clear and intelligible meaning, and have been fully explained by Chinese commentators. The first syllable, I, means without color; the second, Hi, without sound or voice; the third, Wei, without body. The proper translation therefore is:—

"You look (for the Tao, the law) and you see it not; it is colorless.
"You listen and you hear it not; it is voiceless.
"You wish to touch it and you reach it not; it is without body."

Until, therefore, some other traces can be discovered in Chinese literature, proving an intercourse between China and Judea in the sixth century, B. C., we can hardly be called upon to believe that the Jews should have communicated this one name, which they hardly trusted themselves to pronounce at home, to a Chinese philosopher; and we must refer the apparent similarity between I-Hi-Wei, and Jehovah, to the same chapter of accidents, which ought to serve as a useful warning, though it need in no way discourage a careful and honest study of Comparative Theology.

A TRANSCENDENTAL PRAYER.—Exalted and living Will, whom no name can express and no idea embrace, I yet may raise my heart to thee! For thou and I are not divided. Thy voice is audible within me. In thee, the Incomprehensible, my own nature and the whole world become intelligible to me; every riddle of my existence is solved, and perfect harmony reigns in my soul. I veil my face before thee, I lay my hand upon my lips. Such as thou really art, such as thou appearest unto thyself, I can no more behold thee than I can become like thee. After thousands of thousands of lives such as superior spirits live, I should be as little able to understand thee as in this house of clay. What I understand is, from my very understanding it, finite, and by no progression can ever be transformed into the Infinite. Thou differest from the finite, not in degree, but in kind. I will not attempt that which my finite nature forbids. I will not seek to know the nature and essence of thy being. But thy relations to myself and all that is finite lie open before my eyes. Thou createdst in me the consciousness of my duty—of my destination in the series of rational beings; how, I know not, nor need to know. Thou knowest my thoughts and acceptest my intentions. In the contemplation of this thy relation to my finite nature, I will be tranquil and happy. Of myself I know not what I ought to do—I will do it simply, joyfully, and without cavil, for it is thy voice that commands me, and the strength with which I perform my duty is thy strength. I am tranquil under every event of the world, for it is thy world. Whatever happens forms part of the plan of the eternal world and of thy goodness—what in this plan is positive good and what only means of removing existing evil, I know not. In thy world all will end in good—this is enough for me, and in this faith I stand fast; but what in thy world is mere germ, and what blossom, and what the perfect truth, I know not. The only thing which is important to me, is the progress of reason and of morality through all the ranks of rational beings. When my heart is closed to all earthly desires, the universe appears to my eye in a glorified aspect. The dead, cumbrous masses which served only to fill space, disappear, and in their place the eternal stream of life and strength and action flows on from its source,—primeval life: from thy life, thou Everlasting One.—Pichte.

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 16, 1872.

WHOLE No. 151.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ARBOT, Editor.
ABRAHAM WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.

COTATION BROOKS PROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD F. HALLLOWELL, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CURRY, ROY. CHARLES VOYSEY (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), ROY. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

On Pain and Moral Evil.—III.

A SERMON PREACHED IN ST. GEORGE'S HALL, LONDON, JANUARY 21, 1872.

BY THE REV. CHAS. VOYSEY.

"We know that all things work together for good."—Rom. viii. 28.

I have purposely cut off the words of the Apostle which follow, because it is impossible to take for my text any limitations to the ultimate triumph of good over evil, and it would be positively revolting to adopt any notions of predestination and election. If all things are working together for good only "for those who love God," only for those who have been "called" or "predestinated" to an exceptional state of happiness, then we must at once surrender our belief in a perfectly just and loving God; and admit at once that he is unjust, capricious, and cruel, without a single fatherly attribute towards the majority of men. If all men are not alike destined to attain goodness of character with all the blessedness which that state involves, then we can only say that it is a shame that any were born into a condition of sin and suffering to end life as it began. In our present state of mental and moral development, it is absolutely impossible for us to reconcile suffering inflicted without a kind purpose with the existence of a good God; and it is equally impossible to reconcile the final triumph of evil with the existence of a good God who is almighty. Our own hearts tell us that "all things are working together for good" to every human soul, or else there is no God so good as we conceive. God must be either, 1st, able to do this but unwilling; or, 2d, willing but unable; or, 3d, neither able nor willing.

If he be able but unwilling, then he is not good. If he be willing but unable, then he is weaker than evil and creation is a blunder which even human intelligence and human kindness would have guarded against. If he be neither able nor willing, then God is the direct opposite of our highest conceptions, and he sinks below the level of his own imperfect creatures; which is the same thing as saying that there is no God at all. I have stated this in the plainest terms, that it may serve in the place of that demonstration which we cannot furnish respecting the existence and goodness of God and the destiny of man. The dilemma is complete, and I should like to see the arguments overthrown if they can be overthrown, because they are all we have to trust to, the sole rational foundation of our belief apart from religious feeling and personal faith, which are of no use to any one but their owners. We want to believe only what is reasonable and true; if it be in any one's power to show that this belief is false and unreasonable, we will give it up to-morrow, no matter how much personal comfort and hope it may cost us.

In entering upon the second division of the subject which we have lately been considering, namely, the reconciliation of sin and suffering with a belief in the perfect goodness of God, it was desirable to begin by the plain statement of the point we have to argue. It is my object to show that what is commonly called "sin" or "moral evil" is a necessary part of the divine plan in bringing all men to a state of goodness and happiness; and, therefore, that it offers no valid objection to the reasonableness of our belief in God's goodness. But it is only fair to confess at the outset that everything depends on the hypothesis of ultimate good. It is still in any one's power to say: "Your theory is a very pretty one, and it would be delightful if it were true; but you have no proof whatever that there will be a future in which present evil will work its way out into perfect goodness." I reply, No, I have no proof of it. At present, I confess, we have no direct evidence that the hypothesis is true. But, in the absence of such proof, we are wise in taking the balance of probabilities, and in trying to discover which is most likely to be true out of contradictory alternatives.

We pursue this course in arguing with others because, however firmly we may be ourselves persuaded of any given belief, we cannot prove anything by it; we cannot transfer our own convictions at will. With all our hearts, we may believe in God the Father Almighty, and in the certainty of final good to all his creatures; but that goes for nothing with an unbeliever, and so it should. For do not we ourselves reject the firm convictions of other men? Do we not hear, quite unmoved, of fervent prayers offered to Jesus, or to his mother Mary, believing that neither Jesus nor Mary can hear prayers any more than our own lately deceased relatives or friends can, and that, even if they could hear them, they are powerless to answer them? The convictions of other men go for nothing as arguments in proof that their belief is true. Hence it is that we more properly resort to what I have called the balance of probabilities. We have to ask which is the more likely,—that there is a God, or that there is not? That, granting his existence, he is more likely to have moral attributes or none?—more likely to be at least as good and trustworthy as the best of men, or to fall below even the ordinary standard of human justice and kindness? From a view of his stupendous works and wisdom in their creation and guidance, is he more likely to be able or unable to work out the good which we hope for and which we reverently consider it to be his duty to secure for those whom he has called into being? If after due consideration of these and similar alternatives one concludes that there is no ground of hope for the triumph of goodness, then there is nothing for him but to conclude also that God is not what we mean by the word "good," and that it would be an awful aggravation of our misery to have to live for ever under his iron rule.

Indeed, so foreign is such a notion to the human mind that, when the conviction is once reached that God is not good, belief in God at all is also extinguished, and the idea of God is banished from the mind. And this is the history of so-called atheism. The eyes of some men's understanding and sense of right open and open, until they perceive the repulsiveness and the falseness of the image of God presented to them by early education or surrounding creeds; and their aversion for the horrid outlines is so intense that they can escape from the torment of beholding the picture only by denying the very existence of God altogether. This shows, however, that they have already interwoven in the very fibres of their nature, some thoughts of a supreme goodness which made them revolt from the caricature of Deity, and abjure the very name by which it had been called. In the same way men have become avowedly atheistical because their conceptions of Godhead were so exalted. Anthropomorphism in any degree shocks their veneration and rouses their indignation. As they cannot know absolutely more of the Divine Being and mode of his existence than the believers around them can, they refuse to acknowledge a God at all, because they cannot form to their own minds an image of God worthy of that lofty ideal which remains yet undefined in the recesses of their hearts and imaginations. Thus both of these professed atheists do, in fact, bear indirect testimony in favor of the hypothesis that God, if there be a God, must be good and great beyond all human speech and thought. It is for the sake of these more especially that I am pursuing the present consideration of the objections drawn from sin and suffering; and my apparent digression must be excused on the ground that, as in the pulpit all argument is one-sided, it is only fair to make such admissions as one would be driven to make, were the discussion carried on in ordinary conversation. This is why it has been deemed desirable to say, at the outset, that the objection to the goodness of God which meets us in the sins of the world cannot be answered at all, except on the hypothesis that everything is working for the best and must result in the final triumph of good. To put it more plainly still: every man, woman, or child must some day be permanently the better and happier for every sorrow borne,—for every sin committed.

If that be true, it will be no waste of time to examine the facts about sin,—about its origin, its nature, and some of its manifest consequences; whereas, if it be false, we may as well close the inquiry at the threshold. For if this life be the only one we can ever live, all our own highest rectitude can never justify the act of the Creator in having ordered the lives of some to be what they are from the cradle to the grave; but from a moral point of view we should have to regard in a great measure the creation of mankind, in the words of Professor Newman, as "a blunder infinite and inexcusable." The more loyal, in that case, men were to duty, the nobler their self-sacrifice for the well-being of their fellow-men,—the more cruel would be their fate, the more wasteful would be their extinction by death. Weigh, then, the alternatives, and see if it be not on the whole greatly more probable that all things are working together for good to all mankind, than that this life closes the scene of human thought and activity and aspiration. If this be granted, we shall find, I expect, still greater encouragement for our hope in the manifest results of sin as it works under our very eyes. We have now, however, to clear a little and to sharpen our thoughts as to what we are going to talk about.

This sin or moral evil—what is it? How is it caused? Why do we distinguish it from other pain? Let us take this last question first. There are things in the world which we love not only better than other things, but in a different way. It is more blessed to give than to receive. We are more glad, and in a different way glad, to have saved even the life of a fellow-creature than to receive any amount of money. We rejoice more in the moral excellence of any one dear to us than we do in his inheriting a large fortune. So there are some things in the world which give us not only more pain, but a different kind of pain than other things do. We are more wounded by the sense of having done an injury to our neighbor than by having had our pocket picked. We would ten times, a hundred times, rather hear of an accident which had injured the body of one of our children than to hear that that child had committed some disgraceful crime, or had fallen into an immoral habit. We can bear to see them suffer in sickness far more easily than we can bear to think of their lying, or being mean, or cowardly, or cruel. Few men and women, indeed, could be found not to prefer to be the victim rather than the perpetrator of a guilty act.

Sin differs from physical suffering in being the occasion of deeper distress to the offender himself, and of greater shame and distress to others who may be interested in him. To analyze the difference between the two kinds of suffering is much more difficult; for how can we describe the difference between deep remorse and neuralgia? Both are acutely painful; but we are distinctly conscious of a difference between the sensations, though we cannot say what the difference is. The neuralgia may even appear to be the more violent, and to convulse the frame with agony, while the remorse hardly disturbs the outside physical serenity, or becomes visible at all to an observer. But no one doubts which is the worst to bear; no one would hesitate in his manly and womanly character; and I have tried so earnestly to break up some lingering Orthodox superstitions simply because, like tight ligatures about the limbs, they check the spiritual circulation, and thus the spontaneous, elastic motions of the soul. It is true, I have often and persistently attacked the authority of the Bible and the Christ; but why? Because the spirit still under authority is not free, and I count perfect freedom the very crown and glory of humanity, the essential condition of a generous, full-orbed, and grandly sympathetic character. Never have I taken any pleasure in the work of uprooting, even though I felt that I had better seed to sow. Faith in the boundless truth of God is a plant that cannot grow in a parlor flower-pot; it is the Tree of Life, and demands the ample spaces and the fresh, free breezes of all out-doors. So I have not shrunk from the task of transplantation. But first and last, the supreme importance of bearing fruit in character has been the burden of my preaching. The free, pure character that loves truth and goodness for their own sake,—remember, I entreat you, that my ministry has been one long-continued pointing to the beauty and divineness of that. At a regal banquet given by Mark Antony, Cleopatra, the famous queen of Egypt, is reported to have dissolved in a goblet of vinegar her costly necklace of pearl; and then, to dazzle and captivate her Roman lover by sheer wantonness of waste, quaffed it at a draught. Alas for him who, to win the favor of the Prince of Vanity Fair, is willing to dissolve in the corrosive acid of life's strenuous temptations his "pearl of great price"!

[FOR THE INDEX.]
THE SEMITIC RELIGIONS.
 BY C. D. B. MILLIS.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

One of the things considerably needed at the present time is a comparison, dispassionate, thorough, critical, of the Judaic and the Christian religions, as represented in the Bible, with the religions of the surrounding and most nearly related peoples at the time of their origin. Doubtless both Judaism and Christianity had a genesis, a natural, normal birth from something that was before them; and I believe that a full acquaintance, could we once attain it, with the conditions of those times, would go far to elucidate and explain much that has hitherto had no explanation, and been considered unexplainable except on the convenient assumption of miracle.

The field has been so long hedged out from free human inquiry,—we have been so long taught and been wont to believe that to look or to think in this direction was illicit, impious, a mortal sin,—that there have been few explorers, and few of these well qualified for their task. I think you somewhere since, in THE INDEX, made reference to the fact that, among all the institutions of learning in our country (and these count some universities of much liberality), there is not yet one which entertains the study of religion scientifically. The spell is powerful that withholds from inquiry in this direction, permitting not even freedom in the University. But that spell is to be broken; it is being broken.

Not only in the popular mind generally is there an awakening, a rapidly growing disposition to look into this question freely and accept whatever results full investigation may give, but a like liberation is coming among the cultured, with some of the best scholars of our time. Prof. Max Müller of Oxford, a man who seeks to be thoroughly Orthodox and in regular standing with the prevailing church, delivers before audiences of the highest intelligence and accepted respectability a course of lectures on the Science of Religion; and, albeit he ventures only so far as the threshold of his subject and his treatment to that point is not thoroughly fundamental, his classification somewhat arbitrary and superficial, yet a courageous beginning is made. The road is laid open. Other workers are to follow, going farther, articulating more plainly, and bringing out much finer results.

A careful examination of the theology and worship of the Jews, side by side with those of their Chaldean or Babylonian ancestors, and their near neighbors—mostly Semites and doubtless their kindred by blood—will disclose many close relationships where they have been little suspected. Whence Moses derived his theology and his ceremonial, is a question that has been repeatedly asked, but never, so far as I know, quite satisfactorily answered. Perhaps we shall never be able fully to ascertain, as so much that might help us in this search is irrecoverably lost. But Egypt already gives important light on this problem, and shows us coincidences, whether indicating a derivation by the Hebrew from the Egyptian or pointing to a common origin for both in some distant centre, that are quite remarkable.

Going farther back, whence did Abraham draw his worship? How was the religion of this patriarch and his posterity, "the chosen people," related to that in which he had been reared in Chaldea? It may have been and very likely was, an amelioration, a partial advance, a reform; but had it not at bottom some parentage in Chaldea or Babylonia, and did it not retain to the end the distinctive marks of the stem whence it grew? Was circumcision one of the signs of this new covenant and consecration, a seal of the new and heaven-established church? But we find it already in use among the Semites generally (the Phœnicians excepted) from the earliest times. It was also a very ancient rite in Egypt. Where is the proof that with Abraham and his descendants it meant essentially more, or was held as a higher, finer symbol than it had been with Aramaeans and Arabians? Did the Most High communicate himself under a new and peculiar name to this patriarch, the name Shaddai, interpreted to mean the "all-powerful," and then again to Moses by still another name, Jehovah, rendered the "ever-existent"? Was this religion thus differenced and set apart forever from all the others that prevailed around it, and stamped as divine in origin and character, while they were wretched idolatries, the devices of demons? We have long heard such things. Nothing in Christian literature has been more assiduously taught.

And yet on looking carefully we discover that probably no name of the Deity was original with the Jews. The term El, of which Elohim is the plural, one of the oldest and most frequent with them, is widely diffused throughout the Semitic family, and perhaps far beyond. It was a sacred name with the Phœnicians, is present in the Babylonian inscriptions, and is well known to occur constantly both in ancient times and the present with the Arabians. Shaddai was a term likewise employed by the Phœnicians, and may be traced in the hieroglyphic inscriptions in Egypt. And the name of names, Jehovah, more properly Jahveh—the boast of Israel, the name ineffable to the Jew—has a long history and a far-off ancestry. Sydnus says: "By the name Jao the Chaldeans designated God." The same term, a name, as it would seem, of the Sun-god or Fire-god, Rawlinson recently finds in the Babylonian inscriptions.

But a more significant question concerns the meaning of the name or names as employed by the Jews. Did they hint that pure Presence, greater than person, and impossible to be revealed? We should hardly expect it, looking at the origin of their sacred terms, and considering what we know to have been the character of the Jews. Taken at its best, we find that their conception was plainly liminary, sensuous, carnal. The El-Shaddai was to be worshipped by Abraham in a bloody and most unnatural human sacrifice, the slaughter of his own son upon the altar; and the Mosaic Jehovah was an intensely personal, very regal, exacting, self-seeking God, delighting in the smoke of sacrifice, the fragrance of burning victims, the abject prostration and imploring cry of the worshipper. As the names were the same, the character was substantially the same in this worship with those which it succeeded, warred against, and denounced. Under whatever amelioration or partially softened type, the old religions were essentially here with their degrading and revolting idolatries.

A farther interesting inquiry would be how far the narratives which profess to be historic,—the account of the garden of Eden, the children of Adam, the slaying of Abel, the wandering of Cain, the intermarriages, the dispersion, the flood, and so forth,—may correspond with the traditions and mythic stories afloat among the earliest peoples, the Semites, Aryans, and others. There is already enough found here to show that some very curious coincidences lurk in the facts and the fables that lie scattered about in this field.

Christianity, also, had doubtless a human genesis, not only being derived from Judaism, of which it seems at first to have been hardly more than an expanded form, but also from the Gentile world as well, from Greece, Egypt, and the Orient. Jesus withal had brothers; there were other souls in that age inspired outside of Judea; a wave of life and light was flowing upon the world. He had also parentage, came of loins other than those of Joseph or the house of David; and time waits that justice be done to those fine, subtle influences, subtle but natural and altogether human, that in degree made up the man and the institution. It is a broad theme and requires for its treatment the largest preparation and finest faculty.

What is needed is that this history, so long regarded as purely exceptional and miraculous, should be set in line with the general history of the world, and brought under the universal laws, so that what we there find shall be seen to be of the same kind and piece with the general advance of mankind. Such a work would revolutionize history, as now viewed, and would go far to revolutionize religion. Pagan and Christian, Greek and Jew, would all stand in one temple, none having aught to boast as the sole perfect and absolute before the other.

Of course we shall find facts that are not to be accounted for from antecedent conditions; there are everywhere Melchisedeks among mankind, men born without father or mother, descended from the skies and rising ever instinctively to their home. These are the prophets of humanity; they lift forwards, advance powerfully the race.

But it is something, is much, to discover that the world is all of one piece; that there is no thing essentially exceptional in history; that Judaism, Christianity, Bible, Church, our own religion in its best type, all belong to the common stock, and take each with every other its appropriate sisterly place in the career of the thought, the struggles, and onward march of mankind.

[FOR THE INDEX.]
PRAYER, TRADITIONALLY, RATIONALLY, AND SPIRITUALLY CONSIDERED.

BY CHARLES K. WHIPPLE.

Stonewall Jackson, eminent as a leader of cavalry in the war of the rebellion, was not less eminent for piety. Whenever, during that war, his prayers were unusually long and fervent in the night, his negro servant felt sure that a long march or a desperate battle was resolved on for the morrow. While the issue of the rebellion was yet undecided, two Quakers, one favoring the Union and the other the Confederacy, and both convinced that the favor of God would decide the contest, were debating its probable result. "Thee knows," said one, "that Thomas is a praying man." "Abraham also," said the other, "is a praying man." "Yea," returned the first, "but Abraham is so in the habit of joking, that the Lord will hardly consider even his prayers to be meant in earnest."

Whatever may be thought of the accuracy of these stories, it is unquestionable that, during the four years of that war, the prayers of American ministers and church-members were arrayed in absolute opposition to each other. The Southern Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, and Episcopalians prayed for something utterly incompatible with a favorable answer to the prayers, equally fervent, of Northern Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, and Episcopalians. There is no reason whatever for rating the earnest desire or the confident trust in God of either of these parties below that of the other. That piety men in the North believed in the justice of their cause and prayed in the confident assurance that God would favor it, needs no evidence. As little doubt can there be that vast numbers of equally pious Southerners believed as firmly in the rightfulness of slavery and secession. Each prayed for what he thought right; each confidently trusted that God would favor his side; and each leaned, as his ground for such confidence, on the promises recorded in the New Testament, that whatsoever things disciples of Jesus asked for, believing, they should receive. The question now to be examined is, considering the well-known result of the war, what are we to think of those promises upon which the contending parties founded their diametrically opposite prayers?

Some, no doubt, will attribute the success of the North in quelling the rebellion to their work rather than their prayers. I do not propose to consider that question. But we stand in face of the palpable fact that the prayers of the South in that contest, however fervent, however confidently believing, and however backed by work as energetic as that of the North, were not favorably answered. Neither from God nor from his own strenuous efforts did Stonewall Jackson get that for which he and his fellow church-members prayed. This manifest fact must be kept in mind while we look at the letter and spirit of the New Testament promises about answers to prayer, and at the claim set up by the Orthodox church in regard to those promises.

We have now to consider—

The language of Scripture; the Church's theory concerning that language; the view of reason concerning that language; and the verdict of natural religion in regard to prayer.

1. What is the representation by New Testament writers, of the promises made concerning answers to prayer?

Mark (who is supposed to have written somewhere between twenty-eight and thirty-two years after the events which he undertakes to describe) represents Jesus as having said to his disciples, "What things soever ye desire when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them."

Moreover, according to the record, Jesus fortified this all-comprehending statement by the specification of a particular case of the intensest improbability:—

"Verily, I say unto you that, whosoever shall say unto this mountain [pointing to one which stood in their sight near Bethany], Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea; and shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that those things which he saith shall come to pass; he shall have whatsoever he saith."—Mark, xi. 22-24.

In Matthew (supposed to have written from twenty-eight to thirty-one years after the period which he describes), the parallel passage says the same thing: "All things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive."—xxi. 22.

John (whose Gospel is supposed to have been written from thirty-five to sixty-five years after the crucifixion) represents Jesus as having said, "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do."—xiv. 13.

These passages clearly say that any believing petitioner may have any desire accomplished for him. But the same promise is repeated (Matt. xviii. 19) to a concert of believers:—

"Again I say unto you that, if two of you shall agree on earth, as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven."

2. The Orthodox church, as represented by its members in the Boston Young Men's Christian Association, and in the Fulton Street prayer-meeting in New York City, constantly refer to the above promises as promises made by the Deity to themselves; and they not only claim that these promises were intended to be taken in their literal and obvious meaning, but affirm an unvarying literal fulfilment of them in their own experience. They explicitly say that their prayers move the arm that moves the world; and they often, in their public petitions, remind the Deity that his word is pledged to grant the many and various things they have asked for. Full evidence of this can be seen and heard, any week of the year, in both the meetings above referred to.

3. What does reason suggest in regard to this matter?

Ancient history tells us of a ruler who promised one of his subjects, in return for a trifling gratification, to do for her whatever she should ask. We hear that, when the request proved to be that the head of a great and good man should be cut off at once, and brought bleeding before them at the banquet then in progress, the ruler in question "was very sorry." We can hardly conceive that a good and wise ruler, even with the limitations necessarily attendant on human goodness and wisdom, should ever make an offer of this sort to all his faithful subjects, promising to do whatever the ignorance or prejudice of any one of them might ask. Yet this is what we are told to believe of the All-wise, of God himself! We willingly assume that the direction of this world is, and always has been, in the hand of supreme power, guided by perfect wisdom and goodness. It would seem, then, that a human being of even moderate discretion would try to adjust himself and his affairs to that perfect administration, instead of asking that it may be modified to accommodate his farm which wants water, or his vessel when an unfavorable wind keeps her in port, or his other unsatisfactory conditions of body or estate. Can it be imagined, then, that God's wisdom has really pledged God's power to the accomplishment of whatever well-meaning ignorance and prejudice may ask? This would be a pledge not only frequently to change his own method for a worse one, but sometimes to grant two mutually contradictory requests,—like the prayers, a few years ago, of Unionists and Secessionists. Is not such a supposition preposterous, absurd, utterly out of the question? Let us honor God more than to suppose that he has thus subordinated wisdom to unwisdom. He has done, he will do, all things well, precisely because he rules instead of letting us rule.

It is worth while to inquire just here, how a theory so absurd as that God should let men and women have the control of his supreme power, came to have currency in this nineteenth century. This theory, strange to say, rests on two other theories as its foundation. It is assumed as really settled and certain, first, that whatever Jesus of Nazareth said was absolutely correct; and, next, that what Matthew, Mark, and John noted down thirty years after, as their remembrance of his sayings, is also perfectly accurate, both in thought and language. Are those really "reasonable beings" who, on such grounds, assume such manifest imperfection in God's character? No wonder they stigmatize reason as "carnal," when they make the preposterous claim of guiding and controlling God's arm, immediately after confessing themselves "worms of the dust," blind, ignorant, and sinful beings.

The verdict of reason, then, in regard to this matter must be, that we cannot afford to make suppositions discreditable to God for the sake of keeping up the credit of the two Church theories above mentioned. We must maintain our confidence that God is wise as well as good, even though Jesus had really taught something at variance with this doctrine; still more when we find that the alleged words of Jesus are only recollections of his words noted down thirty years after their utterance, by persons who, during his whole ministry, failed to understand what he was trying to teach them. In short, the character of God is of vastly more consequence than the Church's notion that he dictates all the words of all the writers of the Bible.

4. Our final inquiry—using the spiritual sense to judge of spiritual things—is this: What does natural religion think about prayer and answers to prayer?

Religion necessarily implies a reverent sense of the relation existing between the Creator on one side, and the soul, his offspring, on the other. The most spiritual and devout of mankind have regarded God as complete in all perfections,—everywhere present, ever active through the whole range of matter and spirit, and ever sympathetic with the creatures he has made; and no idea of God as less or worse than this can ever be satisfactory to the reflecting mind. God has so made man that friendly communication with other souls is one of the things absolutely indispensable to man's welfare as well as his happiness. He holds such communion with like-minded human beings when they chance to be present with him. Is it not absurd to suppose that he can never hold it with the Heavenly Father, who is always present with him? Is it not still more absurd to suppose that this Heavenly Father, ever present, and ever affectionate, either cannot hear, or does not care to hear, or is not able to answer, what the lonely or suffering human heart seeks to communicate to him? When I say in gratitude, "Praised be the Giver!" when in trial or temptation I say, "Help me wherein I need!" it is monstrous and profane to assume of him who made me either that he does not hear, or that he does not care. Of course he will both sympathize and help. Whether the help will be given in the precise way which my ignorance looks for is very doubtful. It would be extreme folly in me to attempt to define the exact course which the All-wise will take to accomplish my welfare. Enough for me to know that he will accomplish it, and that he knows, and can control, better ways than I know to effect this purpose. The sense of this gives hope and joy to my communion with him. To him, more than to the dearest human friend, I delight to confide what I feel now, and what I aspire to in the vast future; and if at any time my thoughts fix on some event or some method as the particular one most needful for my welfare, faith in Divine wisdom and goodness corrects the error, suggesting confidently—"It will be thus, or better."

[FOR THE INDEX.]

THE CHARACTER OF THOMAS PAINE.

BY CHARLES WATTS THE SECULARIST.

Thomas Paine was essentially a world-wide reformer. National distinctions never interfered with his labors of love. Wherever he observed tyranny, oppression, and corruption, he worked for their removal. By his undaunted efforts he established for himself a name which became a terror to kings and priests, and which won for him a fame that will cause him to be regarded by a thoughtful posterity as a real benefactor of the human race. He had a generous and affectionate nature, a mind superior to fear and selfish interests; a mind governed by the principles of uniform rectitude and integrity; a mind the same in prosperity and adversity; a mind which no bribe could seduce nor terror over-awe. He had a large and benevolent heart; he was faithful to his friends, forgiving to his enemies, compassionate to the unfortunate, self-denying to private interests, but zealous for the public good; magnanimous without being proud, humble without being mean, just without being harsh, simple in his manners, but manly in his feelings,—one on whose word you could rely, and whose countenance never deceived you. In short, his life was spent in doing good, and working for his fellow-creatures, endeavoring to raise them from the low and degraded state in which superstition and political ignorance had placed them. True, Paine did aspire to glory, but it was that glory which Pliny calls "true glory," which consists in having done something worth the writing, having written something worth the reading, and having made the world better and happier for having lived in it.

The following preamble and statement of faith were adopted at a meeting of the First Unitarian Congregational church, Brooklyn, Monday evening, May 6, 1872. It is the church of which the Rev. Mr. Putnam is the pastor.

"Whereas differences of opinion in regard to matters of doctrine are known to exist throughout the Unitarian denomination, and these differences are of so serious a character as to impair its usefulness and imperil its life; and whereas, in view of these facts, a sense of duty and self-respect demands that we should declare, for the information of all who may be concerned to know, what are the fundamental doctrines in virtue of which we claim to be a Christian church,—resolved, that we adopt the following formula viz., 1st. We believe in the Bible, as containing the inspired Word of God. 2d. We believe in one God, the Father, infinitely wise and good, as revealed to us in the Bible; and more especially in the New Testament. 3d. We believe in one Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ; we believe him to be the Son of God, and his specially appointed messenger and representative to our race, endowed with supernatural power, approved of God by miracles and signs and wonders, which God did by him; and thus, by divine authority, commanding the entire obedience of all to whom his Gospel is revealed. 4th. We believe in the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, the Spirit of God given to lead men into all truth and sanctify them in holiness. 5th. We believe in the Church Universal, in the forgiveness of sins on true repentance, in retributive justice, in the resurrection of the dead, and in life everlasting."

We place the foregoing statement before our readers as a specimen of what is transpiring in more than one Unitarian church. We published a similar one quite recently, in which Dr. Chandler Robbins's church placed itself upon the record. The statement speaks for itself. It does not contain all the truth that we believe, and part of the truth which it does contain would have suited us better if it had been expressed a little differently; but is it not absurd to withhold the Christian name and Christian fellowship from a church which stands on such a platform?—N. Y. Independent.

The Rev. Thomas Vickers, of the Free Religious Society, Cincinnati, Ohio, is one of the few consistent liberals. He does not hold to the divine origin of the Scriptures or of Christianity, but only to natural religion. Instead of reading and expounding the Bible on the Sabbath, he sometimes takes up Shakespeare and other poets. And why not? If he believes such poets to be inspired as much as Moses or John, why not thus use them? We have often wondered that the "extreme left" of the liberals had the Bible at all in the pulpit. Why not have a little library there composed of Vedas, Shasters, Koran, Shakespeare, Mrs. Browning, etc., and a Bible? Echo answers, why?—Christian Intelligencer.

There is more than one way of "talking on the subject of religion," and a better way, evidently, than the old English lady had found whose husband was wasting under a lingering disease. The rector expressed a hope that she sometimes spoke to him of the future. "I do indeed, sir. Often and often I wake him in the night, and say, 'John, John, you little think of the torments as is preparing for you.'"

Our nurses are our first theologians.—Hobach.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at OXON HALL, St. Clair Street, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

CASH RECEIPTS.

For the week ending November 16.—Lient. Folger, $5.00; Robert Lynn, 50 cts.; G. W. Kyle, 50 cts.; P. C. McGannon, 50 cts.; J. S. Ewan, 50 cts.; Mrs. C. Lewis, 50 cts.; Daniel Cline, 50 cts.; E. W. Weir, $25; Andrew Ashton, $1; J. M. Hadley, $3; Wm. A. Jenkins, $3; Samuel Warshaw, $13; Joseph Warshaw, $11; Ira Grover, $1; James I. Ferree, $2; Mrs. E. Krackowicz, $3; Ezra Abbot, $3; J. O. Bentley, 50 cts.; N. McLeod, 50 cts.; J. R. Buchanan, $5; Henry Lantz, $1; Susan Hedge, $1; J. G. Burns, $3; J. A. Seiber, $2; Alex. Ebnout, $3; J. Goldmark, $2; A. J. Dickinson, $2; Hayward & Crawford, $3; Wm. P. Chambers, $3; Samuel Shearer, $3; Frank Baldwin, $3; Chas. D. Miller, $3; P. M. Clark, $1; J. W. Cocklin, $3; John Elwell, $3; Geo. W. Brown, $3; Wm. Clough, $3; L. M. Bent, 40 cts.; A. P. Tilden, 50 cts.; Emilio Grill, 10 cts.; Julius Rosenthal, 60 cts.; L. G. Felch, $10; A. S. Brown, $10; W. C. Preston, 10 cts.; R. P. Halliwell, $1; M. Pratt, $3; E. B. Waldo, $7; Alphonso Taff, $10; Mrs. R. D. Francis, $10; Chas. Bonwell, $10; John M. Price, $20; Mrs. E. S. Miller, $10; Clemens Vonnegut, $10; A. Hale, $10; J. E. Follet, $10; Harry Hoover, 20 cts.; Fred. Stearns, $10; Geo. Jerome, $10; G. N. Fleicher, $10; W. P. Wilson, $20.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

N. B.—THE INDEX is payable in advance. Its friends should not be offended if the paper is stopped at the expiration of their terms as indicated by the mail-tags. We have no means of knowing whether they wish it continued or not except by the receipt or non-receipt of the subscription price.

N. B.—Please examine the ADDRESS and DATE on your INDEX mail-tag, and report at once any error in either.

N. B.—If your INDEX mail-tag is not changed within three weeks after renewing your subscription, please notify us immediately. But do not write before the expiration of that time.

N. B.—Postage on THE INDEX is five cents per quarter, dating from receipt of the first number, payable in advance at the place of delivery.

N. B.—In case of any error in your mail-tag, always state the post-office at which the paper is received, and also the name just as it is now printed. Then state any desired correction.

N. B.—Please remit by post-office money-order, by registered letter, or by draft on New York. Cheques on interior banks are liable to discount, and the term of subscription will be proportionally shortened in the credit.

N. B.—When writing about a former remittance, always give the date of such remittance as exactly as possible.

RECEIVED.

GARRETH AND LYNETTE. By ALFRED TENNYSON. D. C. L. Poet Laureate. With Illustrations. Boston: JAMES R. OSGOOD & Co. 1872. 16mo. pp. 96.

THE PENNSYLVANIA PILGRIM, AND OTHER POEMS. By JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER. Boston: JAMES R. OSGOOD & Co. 1872. 16mo. pp. 129.

LECTURE ON VEGETARIANISM. By Emeritus Professor F. W. NEWMAN. London: F. PITCHER, Paternoster Row. 1871.

PROFESSOR F. W. NEWMAN ON VEGETARIANISM. Manchester, Oct. 14, 1873. Reprinted from the Dietetic Reformer.

THOUGHTS ON THE RIGHT CURRICULUM FOR NATIONAL SCHOOLS. By Professor F. W. NEWMAN. A Paper read at the Social Science Congress, Plymouth and Devonport, September, 1873. London. 1873.

THE READER: A Secular and Co-operative Review. Edited by GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE. June, 1873. [London.]

THE MANCHESTER FRIEND. October, 1873. London: F. BOWYER KIRTO, 5, Bishopsgate Street Without.

THE PENN MONTHLY. Devoted to Literature and Social Science. November, 1873. Philadelphia: 506 Walnut Street. $3.50 a year.

THE RELIGIOUS MAGAZINE AND MONTHLY REVIEW. November, 1873. Rev. JOHN H. MORSE, D.D., Editor. Boston: LEO AND C. BOWLES, 36 Bromfield Street. $5.00 a year.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE. November, 1873. Mrs. M. C. BLAND, Editor. Chicago: 255 West Madison Street. $3.00 a year.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.
CAPITAL, $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.
The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 31, 1873. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED elsewhere, Nine Hundred Shares, $90,000
E. NAUBERG,	New York, N. Y.,	Five " 500
ARNOLD TAXER,	" " " " " " " " " " " "	One " 100
A. M. LEE,	" " " " " " " " " " " "	One " 100
PARDON ARMITAGE,	Lawrence, Mass.,	One " 100
MRS. H. E. PERKINS,	Dover, N. H.,	One " 100
MISS EMILY BOCK,	New York, N. Y.,	One " 100
J. GOLDMANN,	" " " " " " " " " " " "	One " 100
A. M. HOWLAND,	Boston, Mass.,	Five " 500
CHAR. A. GURLEY,	Pulaski, N. Y.,	Two " 200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin, Pa.,	Five " 500
MRS. L. M. PLUMMER,	Newbury, Mass.,	One " 100
NATHANIEL LITTLE,	" " " " " " " " " " " "	One " 100
THOMAS LITTLE, JR.,	" " " " " " " " " " " "	One " 100
CHARLES EDWARDS,	Oberlin, Ohio,	One " 100
B. NAUBERG,	New York, N. Y.,	One " 100
ANDREW E. WHITMORE,	Illon, " " " " " " " " " " " "	One " 100
CHAR. BURNHAM,	Lynn, Mass.,	One " 100
MRS. A. F. CURTIS,	Cambridgeport, " " " " " " " " " " " "	One " 100
JOHN McDUFFIE,	" " " " " " " " " " " "	One " 100
MRS. M. E. BIRD,	New York, N. Y.,	One " 100
		$98,300

The Index.

NOVEMBER 23, 1873.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

BUSINESS NOTICE.—All communications without exception, on all matters pertaining to the paper, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, DRAWER 28, TOLEDO, OHIO." All cheques, drafts, and post office money orders, should be made payable to "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION." No responsibility is assumed for loss of money or neglect in the fulfilment of orders, unless these directions are STRICTLY COMPLIED WITH.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—THE INDEX will be enlarged to sixteen pages at the commencement of its fourth volume, Jan. 1, 1874. After Sept. 28, 1873, the price of subscription will be $3.00 a year in advance. But every subscriber, new or old, who remits $3.00 at once will be credited with a year's subscription from Jan. 1, and will meantime receive the paper free, if not already paid for.

FREE RELIGION AND SOCIAL REFORM. IV.

The first two answers to the question, "What is the best and most effective means of social reform?" have been already stated. Christianity replies, "The Church," but it looks to the realization of reform in another world, and despairs of a natural solution of the problem so far as this world is concerned. Society makes reply in a hundred disconnected, competing, and often jarring attempts to correct different special evils one by one; but for lack of unity of purpose and spirit it accomplishes little, and such reform as actually gets realized should be credited far more to the operation of general and irresistible causes than to the activity of special reformers.

The abolition of African slavery in the United States is an instance in point. No one could be more desirous than we are to give all glory to the anti-slavery reformers for their grand moral protest against a national iniquity, which pricked the conscience and emboldened the heart of the people to resist any further aggressions of the slave-power. But it remains true, nevertheless, that it was the madness of the slaveholding South, rather than the wisdom or virtue of the non-slaveholding North, that at last abolished slavery within the States. Secession once attempted, the logic of events and the laws of war did the rest; and to "military necessity," not to the Anti-Slavery Society, will history finally attribute the dazzling success of the most conspicuous reform of the century. The inherent feebleness of modern reform is thus set in an especially strong light by its most resplendent apparent victory. In consequence, therefore, of the confusion and frequent clashing of the special reforms into which the general reformatory purposes of the age has split, society has no clear, coherent, definite answer to give to the question stated above. Its only answer is a bewildering medley of inharmonious voices; and the public mind waits for some intelligible reply to it in a state of painful perplexity.

There is, however, a third answer to this question, to be given by Free Religion. By this name we would indicate, not a new religion originating when the Free Religious Association started into being (although this particular name first came into use at that time), but rather religion itself, set free from superstition, dogmatism, and ecclesiasticism. Its origin lies away back, centuries ago, in the first stirrings of the spirit of freedom in the dawn of the Protestant Reformation. The succeeding centuries were the period of its gestation in the womb of Christianity; but now it claims its rights as a great historic movement in thought and life, independent of its parent. In presuming to call the reply we have to offer to the question under consideration "the answer of Free Religion," we would distinctly disclaim the pretence of regarding this reply as anything more than an interpretation put upon this great movement by a single individual who arrogates no right to speak by authority or to commit any one else to his own views of the movement. The reply now offered is undoubtedly a mere approximation to the true one; and its errors or inadequacies will certainly be corrected by the better matured thought of the future. So be it; we rejoice in that anticipation. But it behooves every one to make such contribution as he can towards the illumination of man's pathway to better things,—even though it be but the flickering ray of a penny candle.

Before essaying, however, to sketch the method of social reform as proposed by Free Religion, it is necessary to define its relation to the methods already described. These two methods, namely, Christian ecclesiasticism and the indefinite multiplication of special reforms without regard to their mutual relations, are the most formidable obstacles to the adoption of any better method. What is wanted is a simple but comprehensive plan of universal natural reform, based on universal principles and carried into execution by the universal consent and co-operation of the community. It presupposes a general agreement as to the causes of all social evil, and a concentration of the entire energies of mankind in the work of removing them. Now Christianity reduces all these causes to the fundamental depravity of human nature, for which there is no natural remedy whatever; and its whole influence is therefore cast against the adoption of any purely natural method of reform. Society, on the other hand, believes these causes to be as various as the special evils it deplors; it therefore adopts a different means of reform in each case, and squanders its strength, wealth, and time in superficial and ineffective expedients. Could anything be clearer than that a philosophical or scientific plan of reform has no chance of adoption, still less of success, until the comparative uselessness of these false methods is well understood? The social evils now endured by mankind are so vast and wide-spread that nothing short of the combined effort of the whole race could effectually dissipate them. Whatever stands in the way of this universal combination of effort is a great obstacle to reform. The first requisite of reform, therefore, is the abandonment of the two false methods now employed, the one as totally useless and the other as inadequate. The ecclesiastical method of Christianity is positively injurious, since it begets a general acquiescence in existing evils as incurable, and absorbs a vast proportion of the wealth and energy of the community in the furtherance of utterly chimerical objects. The secular method, or rather no-method, now employed by society in its attempts at reform undoubtedly accomplishes considerable good; but it is so feeble and desultory, so unorganized and even self-contradictory, that not a tithe of the real reformatory power of the community gets utilized.

We regard it, therefore, as the first merit of Free Religion that it declares open war against the ecclesiastical method of reform as worse than useless, while it seeks to organize, enlarge, and correct the secular method, as alone competent to produce valuable results. It must not flinch from this direct conflict with the vast instituted superstition of the Christian Church; it must not shrink from this direct antagonism with the fundamental ideas of the Christian gospel. Not to perceive, not to discharge, this stern duty of warfare with Christianity, would be to dash to the ground untasted the golden chalice of man's great hope of the future. Neither must Free Religion refrain from exposing the one-sidedness, the narrowness, the superficiality of the idea of reform as now too often acted upon, namely, that a great prevailing evil can be eradicated by special measures, without reference to other evils or to the deep common causes whence all social evils equally proceed. In order to prepare the way for the future adoption of its own method, Free Religion must accept the imperative double-duty of exploding the ecclesiastical method and of organizing the secular method of social reform. It must frankly oppose Christianity, not in defiance or hate or scorn, but in the noble spirit of the surgeon who consents to inflict pain for the sake of saving life. And it must take up the arduous task of organizing the ideas of reform, in order ultimately to organize its forces.

Let it not for one moment be supposed that we class "Free Religion" with other reforms, as one of them; it is not a reform, but reform itself. Although we sometimes speak of "the free religious reform," we do so in the sense that Free Religion is the essential thought, purpose, and spirit from which all reform must proceed,—the guiding principle and animating enthusiasm which, however imperfectly comprehended, prompt in reality every effort to ameliorate society or ennoble human life. How strikingly true this is,—how certain is the fact that all the phases of modern reform have sprung from one or more of the fundamental ideas of Free Religion, imperfectly applied to particular abuses,—we shall try to show by and by. It is enough now simply to state the fact itself.

Let it also not be supposed that Free Religion either promises or expects to work out a sudden cure of the great evils that afflict mankind. An over-sanguine temper possesses many devotees of special measures, who fail to see how deep-seated are the causes of these evils, and consequently over estimate the efficacy of their favorite remedies. Some advocates of Woman Suffrage, for instance, express an extravagant confidence in the power of the ballot to elevate the condition of woman. The measure thus proposed is eminently excellent and just in itself, and will certainly conduce much to the desired result. But its influence as a reformatory measure will be far less than is fancied by some too confident reformers. Free Religion recognizes the deep-seated nature of all great social evils, and the consequent necessity of time for their thorough eradication. Its method, therefore, must be a wise and patient one, productive less of immediate than of permanent results. A sure cure is the object to be desired, not a speedy apparent cure to be followed by a relapse.

What, then, is the answer of Free Religion to this question as to the best method of social reform?

Briefly: NATURAL EVOLUTION, PROMOTED BY HUMAN EFFORT UNDER THE INSPIRATION OF FAITH IN MAN.

In other words, society must be reformed by its own intelligent co-operation with Nature, and must be stimulated to this co-operation by faith in Man as both individually and socially a progressive being. Back of all intelligent effort at reform, either recognized or unrecognized, must be faith in Nature as a self-evolving whole—faith in the universe as a unit whose forces all tend to its own higher evolution; and faith in Man as a progressive being, as a component part of this self-evolving whole, is plainly included in faith in Nature. Here, then, we reach the fundamental principle, the inspiring power, of Free Religion,—FAITH IN NATURE AND MAN. How this power is to be applied, and how the method of social reform adopted by Free Religion is to deal with social evils, must be explained in another article.

Next week we shall probably have from Mr. Potter some account of the Philadelphia and New York Conventions of the Free Religious Association, which we doubt not were all that could be desired. To our own friends in those cities who were expecting that we should be present according to announcement, we would express our great regret that a sudden and severe, though not dangerous, illness prevented our leaving home. While it is pleasant to know that we could not be essential to the success of meetings which were graced by the presence of the eminent speakers who took part in them, it is due to myself to state that nothing but absolute inability prevented the fulfilment of our engagement.

FATHER BURKE'S LECTURES.

The first thing that thoroughly proved the progress which the anti-slavery crusade had made was the fact that the slave-holder was fairly put upon his defence, came forward to the bar of public opinion, and claimed that slavery was not only expedient and necessary but right.

In the same way it seems to show the advance which free religion is making against ecclesiasticism, especially as it is represented by the Roman Catholic Church, that that church now feels called upon to enter the public arena, and defend her doctrines and her practices on the same grounds of reason and public utility on which they are attacked. So Father Burke comes forward in a popular lecture to show that Catholicism is the safeguard of America instead of her danger.

It is hardly fair to judge any lecture by a newspaper report, since it never gives the nice shadings of opinion; but we presume it will be just to assume as correct a reporter's account of Father Burke's first statement, that Unity in Religion is the great security of the State; for this principle is the grand basis of the Roman Church, and it is on this ground that she claims her supreme right and to this end that her institutions are adjusted. Not that she is alone in this claim, for many Protestant sects and countries make the same claim, each one maintaining that its own special doctrines, as being the truth, shall form the basis of this unity. But in the sense in which Father Burke uses this word, as implying uniformity of doctrine, practice, or confession of faith secured by authority or indeed by any outward means, unity, instead of being a condition of life and safety, is only a state of destruction and death. It is the last thing to be desired in a world of progress, that all opinions and actions should be conformed to a definite standard. Variety in unity or harmony, because every free impulse of human nature is carried out to its legitimate result, is the only condition of safety in a State, because it is the only condition of active, vigorous health.

Father Burke himself sees this in every other department of life, and claims freedom and variety of political and intellectual action; but in the most important of all functions this principle, he thinks, fails, and we must have definite authority to produce uniformity. He speaks of the evil effects of Protestantism in suffering the varied interpretations of the great authority, the Bible; not seeing that the evil comes from retaining a part of the vicious principle and restraining the free activity of the human mind within the arbitrary limits of a book. Between a book as authority, and a Pope or a Council, there are certainly fair arguments to be brought in favor of the latter, since human nature in any form has a chance of progress, and, as we have actually seen in the Catholic Church, a living council may partake of the spirit of the age and country more than can a printed book. But we must always, in religion, in politics, in society, in education, recognize this fundamental truth, that there can be no living, healthy unity except by the union of freedom and variety, so that the harmony shall result from finding a central, inward law which acts in all these various forms, not from imposing an outward law which may not be really true to any.

This is the great law of art, as expressed in the resolution of discords into harmony in music, of contrasting colors placed near each other in painting, of the balancing of lines and quantities in sculpture and architecture. It is the great social law by which a career is opened to talent, and each individual, working out what he can do best, finds an absolute dignity and value in his achievements and position, whatever may be their relative importance compared with those of other men. So in education a French writer truly says: "We must have different studies because capabilities are different, and it is in this very diversity that we find true equality."

So we welcome Father Burke most heartily to the lecture platform, feeling that the more strongly and clearly he states the doctrines which lie at the foundation of his ecclesiastical views, the more will he excite thought and inquiry among his hearers, and so the more promote the safety of the Republic which consists in free thought and inquiry on religious as on all other questions.

E. D. C.

ENGLAND.

THE TINKER'S HOME—VOYSEY AND MARTINEAU —THE LORD MAYOR'S CHAPLAIN—HANGING RELIGION.

LONDON, Oct. 23, 1872.

A curious instance of what the heretical would call "garnishing the sepulchres of the prophets, while stoning their successors," has just occurred in the old town of Bedford. All the world knows that it was there that the old tinker, John Bunyan, was imprisoned. The gaol in which his famous allegory was written has now become the chief glory of the city that incarcerated him. The Bedfordians appreciate the honor of their association with the memory of Bunyan to such an extent that they have just now proposed to erect a statue to him. Bunyan does, indeed, need no monument save that which his own poetic genius has built; nevertheless it is well enough that the descendants of those who incarcerated him should even at this late day make the amende honorable. Yet I have just learned that the Rev. Charles Voysey, who preached last Sunday at Leicester, went over to Bedford to fulfil an engagement to lecture there; the lecture, however, could not be given, and, at last accounts, had no prospect of being given, because the Bedfordians would not permit their hall to be occupied by a heretic! It is marvellous how character is transmitted from generation to generation, with communities as well as with families. As at Tyre the traveller still finds the people engaged in making the "Tyrian purple" and other dyes, and as nearly all the ancient cities, even amid their ruins, pursue the occupations for which they were famous in the time of the Bible or Herodotus, so here we find the people of Bedford testifying that they are the children of them that could find no better use to which to put John Bunyan than to immerse him in a dungeon.

Mr. Voysey's opponents seem resolved to make him the most popular and eminent figure of the time. The heretics will be glad of as much of this kind of hostility as the Orthodox choose to indulge in. But they (the heretics) have sorrows of another kind which are not easily borne, and one of these has just fallen upon them with peculiar heaviness. The tidings of the illness of the Rev. James Martineau, which had for some time been abroad, culminated last Sunday, when his congregation, on repairing to the Portland Street Chapel, were met with his resignation of the pulpit instead of the eloquent discourse which has long made that, to reverent and thoughtful men and women, the most hallowed spot in London. I am glad to be able to announce to the many friends and admirers of Mr. Martineau in America, that there is no cause for alarm at present in regard to his health. His late attack has been rather an admonition than a prostration; and, though he was very ill for a time, he has recovered sufficiently to pay several visits this week to his College. But his physicians have already imperatively forbidden his preaching farther, and it is probable that, severe as the trial would be to him, he will have also to suspend for some time his labors in the Manchester New College,—the corner-stone upon which the Unitarian Church of Great Britain rests, and which, in turn, rests upon Martineau.

Sir Sydney H. Waterlow, the new Lord Mayor of London, has appointed the Rev. Mr. Rogers, a clergyman of the Church of England, to be his chaplain during his term of office. The same clergyman was appointed by Mr. Sheriff Bennett some time ago to be the Shrieval Chaplain. Both Waterlow and Bennett are old religious radicals, and they and their families were among the founders of South Place Chapel. The appointment of a clergyman of the Church to be their chaplain is not to be set down to any default on their part from their old sentiments. The appointment to such an office of a religious radical would be a scandal such as no man of ordinary sensibilities could be expected to endure, even were it possible for one of their own faith to fulfil the duties of the office,—which is doubtful. I believe the only instance in which a Lord Mayor has ever departed from the immemorial custom which assigns this, like most other snug morsels, to Church clergymen, was in the case of the late Lord Mayor Lawrence, who appointed to that office a Unitarian of a very mild type,—Thomas Mudge, if I remember rightly. Still there was a great howl over it, and I doubt if the experiment is ever repeated. To show how potent traditions of this kind are, I may mention that, since I have resided in London, there have been two Jews elected to be Lord Mayors. They were not converted Jews of the Disraeli kind, but members of the synagogue in full connection. They had a perfect legal right to appoint Rabbins to be their chaplains; yet both of them appointed clergymen of the Church of England! Nay, so strong was the routine of their office, that I have been told upon good authority that neither of them dared to withhold any of the normal contributions for various Christian purposes given each year by the occupant of the Mansion House to the hungry trustees of the various societies. The Israelite Mayors even gave the usual contribution to the Society for the Conversion of the Jews! The selection by Sir Sydney Waterlow of the Rev. Mr. Rogers is, it should be said, one that pleases the Orthodox even less perhaps than Mayor Lawrence's selection of a mild Unitarian. For Rogers is not only one of the most radical of the Broad Churchmen, but is labelled with a legend of shocking doctrinal looseness. Once, when he was trying to make some arrangements about the school connected with his city pariah (for, like most rationalists, he seems to indulge the hope of saving his soul by saving the poor), some one in a meeting which he had called asked what preparations had been made for proper instruction in religion. "Oh, hang religion!" was the ejaculation of this misguided man. The story got into the papers, and Rogers passed under a cloud from which only the heretical municipal magnates mentioned have dared to raise him.

M. D. C.

FAITH IN MAN.

Everybody has heard the distinction between Universalists and Unitarians which Starr King once gave: "Universalists believe that God is too good to damn men, and Unitarians believe that man is too good to be damned." This definition very aptly expresses the leading ideas of these two denominations. The key-note of half the sermons in Universalist pulpits in this country, it is safe to say, is: "God is good; therefore man will be saved." In fact, this key-note is about the only one you do hear, until you long for some change, and would be refreshed by a little damnation doctrine by way of interlude now and then. You are willing to take for granted that God is good, and that man will be saved, or anything else, if they will only stop talking about it. As we leave the church, the refrain of that beautiful Vedic Hymn comes to our mind, and we exclaim with the Hindu poet: "Have mercy, Almighty, have mercy!" No doubt this "oft told tale" finds new hearers occasionally and converts some one to the belief that "God is too good to damn men,—therefore, &c." This is certainly a noble and an ennobling faith, and good for man to have; but in order to keep it, he is sometimes obliged to keep away from Universalist Churches. At least this is our experience.

The Unitarians, on the other hand, emphasize, not so much the goodness of God, as the goodness of man. "Man is too good to be damned," they say. "I cannot but pity the man who recognizes nothing God-like in his own nature," said Channing. And so great was his faith in the progressive nature and infinite possibilities of man, that he also said: "I no longer see aught to prevent our becoming whatever was good and great in Jesus on earth." Yet he thought Jesus was something "more than a human being," "did not regard him as a mere man," &c. So it would appear that the father of Unitarianism in this country believed that "mere man" might develop into something "more than a human being" in the far away future. What kind of a creature he would be if not a human being, we cannot imagine. Do not these expressions, "mere man," and "Jesus more than human," as used by Dr. Channing, betray in him the lingering inherited prejudice against the natural man as something inferior and depraved? He had great faith in man, it is true, and great faith in what man might become; but, after all, was not his faith in man conditioned on man's faith in Jesus as the "way, the truth, and the life"? And if we understand them, this is the faith in man which Unitarians preach to-day. It is a satellite to their primary doctrine of faith in Christ. They have faith in man—in what he is to be—if he will follow Christ. But suppose he goes off searching for a way, truth, and life by himself—what then? If consistent, they ought to despair of man just as much as the Orthodox do when they see him reject Christ as Redeemer and Savior. This is a very great "if," and fatal to any true and abiding faith in man.

Believers in Free Religion in this country (I only speak for myself of course) have faith in man without any such ifs or provisos. They have faith that the human race is destined to some good end, though they may not march in the "way" that Jesus walked; they have faith that the free mind of man can discover and appropriate whatever "truth" is good for him to know without taking it second-hand from Jesus, or following after him, or becoming as a little child at his feet; and notwithstanding the reverence which they may have for the "life" of the pure and loving teacher of Nazareth, they think it is quite possible that, among the millions of men before Jesus was born and since he died, there may have been one or two, even three, as pure, unselfish, noble, and exemplary characters as he was. If we have less faith in Jesus as "the way, the truth, and the life," it is because we have more faith in these things as revealed and revealing in the "God in Humanity."

"Man need no gas to aid lang syne
For truth to guide him,
For if he seeks, he sure will find
Truth close beside him.
Each day is ordained o' grace
To be his teacher,
And lika toddlin' weanle's face
Is text and preacher.

"The power above, see kind and guid,
Who ever sees us,
Will gi'e to men, whene'er they need,
A John or Jesus.
The sin o' Adam will na' cause
His love to vary,
Nor need he change creation's laws
To form a Mary."

The believers in Free Religion can be grateful for the lofty moral precepts which Jesus bequeathed to mankind, in common with other great religious teachers, without accepting him as the only channel of divine truth. He believes that—

"If he seeks, he sure will find
Truth close beside him."

Yes, a truth, a way, and a life nearer than Palestine and better for us than much that Jesus taught.

Faith in Christ! What do they mean? We can partly understand the believer in the Deity of Christ when he tells us that he has "faith in Christ," for Jesus is to him a sort of diffused essence of Deity, an omnipresent Person, loving and working for man. But what does the Unitarian mean by "faith in Christ"? Is the man Jesus not dead, and do we have faith in dead men? We can only have faith in the living and in the present. Do you say that it is faith in the teachings of Jesus? Yes, in certain teachings, because we have tested them and found them conducive to spiritual health and growth; but have we not also weighed in the balance other doctrines of his and found them wanting,—such as the doctrine of personal devils, eternal punishment, speedy end of the world, etc.? If you dare to reject these teachings, then you have more faith in your own judgment than in Jesus, and are consciously or unconsciously on free religious ground; for you are putting faith in man above faith in the "Master." This is a common heresy, though it walks often in the garb of orthodoxy. It denies the Master in the name of allegory and rhetoric.

But we are told that we ought to have faith in Jesus, since his teachings have proved themselves adequate to the wants of men for eighteen centuries. But some of them have not proved adequate. "He brought immortality to light." To whom? Not to this century; or why do millions of people to-day eagerly seek for evidence of a future life in the phenomena of Spiritism or in the philosophy of intuition? They crave something, a "truth and life," which Jesus does not supply. There is a vast and increasing number of people who are not convinced of a conscious existence hereafter by a casual remark of Jesus to the thief on the cross, or his assurance of a mansion in the skies for us, or Paul's assertion respecting a "spiritual body," and the apparition of Jesus to "above five hundred brethren at once," or any other evidence which Christians offer. A great many people are getting to have more faith in the opinion of Drs. Carpenter and Maudsley about the relation of brain and mind, and the reality of another life, than they have in Paul or Peter, John or Jesus. To them Jesus utterly fails to bring immortality to light. Yet they have faith that man by patient and faithful research will, in time, reach the truth that lies wrapped in the great "mystery," and see it face to face.

And again, whatever Jesus and James may have thought about the "physical value of prayer," Prof. Tyndall in the name of science denies it; and we have faith, not in the assertions of Jesus or James, but in the authority of science and in our own observations. When James tells us that the "prayer of faith shall save the sick," we think James mistaken, and are ready to prove it by public tests; or when he urges that Elias stayed and brought rain by his prayers, we reply that we only have faith in Elias when his prayers conform to meteorological laws. We have more faith in the figures of the weather prophets of to-day than in the praying prophet of old. In nothing do we regard Jesus, or any dead or living man, as the only way, truth, and life for all mankind. We believe in the solidarity of the race and the democracy of mind. We decline to get down on our spiritual knees to any king less than the Sovereign Power of the universe. We reverence the name of Jesus and gratefully accept as true much of his teaching; but we do not hold him so near our eyes as to blind us to the rest of the universe. We have faith that some of his words will never die, but grow brighter as the centuries roll; but we have faith also that mankind could now teach him some things which he never knew, and is able to find a way, truth, and life for itself better than Jewish Scriptures reveal. If, then, we have less "faith in Christ," it is because we have more faith in man.

W. H. S.

It is cause for great rejoicing, even in the midst of profound sorrow, that the first reports of the destruction by the Boston conflagration were exaggerated far beyond even the terrible reality, and that the indomitable courage of the citizens refused to yield under the sudden and fierce ordeal by fire. Boston still lives, to enjoy a future even grander than her past. The ruined streets will be rebuilt with still greater magnificence than before; the substantial prosperity of the beautiful old city will be more than revived; its enterprise and commercial growth will scarcely be interrupted. Most sincerely we hope that those who were obliged to behold the wreck of their individual fortunes (and among these were some of the noblest and truest friends of THE INDEX and its cause) will more than recover all they have lost; and we cannot help saying that they have our warmest and profoundest sympathy. The same qualities that made Boston famous and great long years ago, survive to-day, and have most signally proved that the children are worthy of their sires. May new glory, freshly won, draw ever-new admiration and love to the Mecca of the western world!

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

WILLING AND PERMITTING EVIL.

DUNKIRK, Sept. 18, 1872

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—I wish to propose for solution a question in the domain of moral philosophy, not in a spirit of captiousness or controversy, but simply for information. The question is this: what is the difference between willing and permitting evil? In other words: is a person accountable for the existence of an evil he expressly permits?

I am prompted to ask this question from reading "Words of Pius IX." in the Boston Pilot of Sept. 21. The words are these:—

"We cannot seek, nor can we find, this simplicity amongst those who direct public affairs; on the contrary, we see amongst them malice and the most refined iniquity, which drives them on to the destruction of every work inspired by the spirit of God. And God permits this to prove his Church."

Of course, all this is now infallibly true, since the Pope, who has said it, is infallible. It is a great advantage to have on earth an infallible head of religion, because it settles every question forever.

Here it is plainly asserted that God permits the destruction of every work inspired by his own spirit! I fear that, on the terms of the above extract, the last mentioned work of God, the proving of his Church, is not quite safe. But I must say no more, lest I should obscure the question I have laid before you.

J. T. BLAKENET.

[It will probably take a wiser head than ours to satisfy our correspondent on this point. Our own opinion, however, is that between willing and permitting preventable evil no real difference exists. Nevertheless it may happen that a real good is obtainable only at the cost of some real evil; in which case he who wills the good may be said in one sense to permit the evil also, although the "permission" is wholly involuntary. Philip Gould, the colored hero who recently lost his life in saving the lives of several women, pushed them down an embankment in order to rescue them from a railway train close at hand. Very likely the women were hurt somewhat by the fall; yet the saving of their lives was secured, and they would have been thankless enough if they had blamed poor Gould for the slight injuries received. He "permitted" the evil, it is true; but it was in consideration of the great good.]

If it is a good thing that virtue should be possible, then in order to secure it vice must be possible, too. A morally free being must be as free to follow one as the other; and the virtue or the vice can have no "first cause" but himself. If Nature intends to have moral beings at all in the universe, she cannot prevent the possibility of wrong-doing,—any more than she can prevent the existence of an inside in whatever has an outside. In other words, man, if he is a moral being (as he seems), must shoulder the responsibility of his own moral acts, and not fancy he can shove it off upon Nature.—ED.]

THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—What is your explanation of the early and persistent belief of the Christian Church in Christ's resurrection? This is the crucial miracle of Christian history. There are multitudes in Christian churches this day who would not be there but for the power which a conviction of the reality of Christ's resurrection from the dead has over them. I know this to be the case. If Christ did rise from the dead, then was he all that he professed to be. If we admit this, we must admit all the miracles he wrought and all the doctrines he taught.

A clergyman said in my hearing the other day that a man must be insane or a fool that would deny the resurrection of Christ, in view of all the testimony.

Let me hear your views on the question of questions.

A SUBSCRIBER.

[We are more sure of the intrinsic incredibility of the alleged resurrection of a man really dead than of any proffered explanation of other men's credulity with regard to it. How this Christian belief arose, we should not be presumptuous enough to decide. Enough for us that the experience of mankind does not sanction it. People will continue to believe the story, doubtless, until better education has dissipated all belief in the miraculous. Our correspondent will find the whole subject of the "resurrection of Jesus" discussed critically and at length by Strauss and other radical theologians; we have neither space nor time to consider it here.—E.D.]

PLATO ON PRAYER.

CINCINNATI, Nov. 1, 1872.

F. E. ABBOT, Esq.:

Dear Sir,—In view of the present discussion on the nature of prayer, I was much struck recently by the aptness of the following extract from that old "heathen" Plato, which seems to meet the question with a clearness and pointedness not often excelled, if indeed equalled, nowadays:—

"Prayer is the ardent turning of the soul toward God; not to ask any particular good, but good itself,—the universal supreme good. We often mistake what is pernicious and dangerous for what is useful and desirable. Therefore, remain silent before the gods, till they remove the clouds from thy eyes, and enable thee to see by their light, not what appears good to thyself, but what is really good."

Yours truly,
ALFRED J. WOLF.

"TWO OR THREE GATHERED TOGETHER."

NORTHUMBERLAND, Pa., Oct. 1, 1872.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

Man should be a thinking as well as a gregarious animal. Necessary conditions to his being so are freedom of inquiry and a disposition to use that freedom. This would imply the acknowledged legitimacy of free discussion, and the absence of legal and social tyranny. Especially have sectarianism and party spirit no legitimate place in morals and religion; and to commit instruction in them to the exclusive care of a certain class of persons would seem as unreasonable as to take a like course with the subject of chemistry or agriculture, and perhaps would be more mischievous.

Some of us have had occasion to feel how dismal a day is Sunday, when the cloud of superstition hangs thick around, casting a gloom over all innocent amusement, deforming the little social intercourse it allows by a repulsive cant, and thus preventing the healthful restoration of energies overtaken by the labors of the week. It is natural that such outrage should call to our minds the not altogether unphilosophic caprice of Diogenes, who is said to have gone through the streets of Athens in the day time with a lantern in his hand, saying, when asked why he did it, that he was looking for a man.

I live near this place, and all my neighbors are farmers. Some of them agreed with me of late in thinking that the state of things was becoming intolerable, and that something ought to be done to improve it. With a view to good example, at least, in that direction, meetings or social gatherings have occasionally been appointed to be held at some neighbor's house on Sunday, and notice was given with the announcement that there would probably be no superstitious proceedings at the meeting. Some of the neighbors, men and women, have attended on such occasions, and discourses have been read from THE INDEX, followed by discussion. Sometimes inspiring music has lent its aid, and there has been a pleasant social time. A grand repository, by the way, of material for such uses, is THE INDEX.

It seems likely that the practice mentioned, if largely introduced, would be exceedingly salutary, as tending to break up that fashion of degrading subservency which spoils all that is social in human nature, and shuts the door against the higher joys of life. Of course, the change desired must be gradual; for truth is proclaimed in vain to those who are not able to appreciate it.

Very truly yours,
CHARLES COLLINS.

P. S.—Orationem amicit tul JOANNIS WEISS Bostoniensem non semel legere aggressus, difficiliorum inveni quam ut ad finem legere possem. Figurarum est lucem, non auctoritatem, afferre; et cavendum scribenti ne illorum supra modum progrediatur. Gravior ille peccat; nam, quam insignis inter instauratores vere religionis ut scientie nulla scriptorum consuetudine auctoritate pendens, sed ratione naturali nitens, et, quodcumque tractare velit, sanguine et viribus abundans, rem tamen subjectam sepe imaginibus coarctat obscurat.

Qui flores in horto invisentibus modeste monstrat, voluptati verumque rerum notitiam inservire potest. Qui eorum incerto crepusculo et lubrico visis titubans, necnon pedetentim vadentes, jamdudum visum florum aversantes, per transtris prope infinitos trahit, ille caveat oportet ne gravet amicos.

In peccatore inveniens, prope abest fortasse ut ipse in eodem genere peccaverit. C.

[Probably Mr. Weiss will be amused, if not flattered, by so learned a criticism as the above; and although we were charmed by the beauty and fragrance of the "flowers" referred to, we think he will not be averse to this expression of a different taste in rhetoric.—E.D.]

UNTRUTH IN THE PULPIT.

BY REV. E. C. TOWNE.

Is it worth while to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, in a pulpit like that of Yale College? The average pulpit is given over for the present to a system of concealing truth, and half telling truth, and as much as half telling what is not true. Mr. Beecher says in his Lectures (p. 78): "I think that our profession is in danger, and in great danger, of going under, and of working effectively only among the relatively less informed and intelligent of the community; of being borne with in a kind of contemptuous charity, or altogether neglected, by the men of culture who have been strongly developed on their moral side." And again he says (p. 82): "The wide degeneration of Christianity into a kind of ritualistic mummery and conventional usage shows very plainly that the past history of preaching Christianity is not to be our model. We must find a better mode."

But, giving up to such condemnation the average pulpit, is it not permitted us to expect better things, things of honest and effective truth, of a pulpit like that of Yale College?

I ask this question after listening to a labored sermon by so distinguished a preacher as Dr. Bacon, in which he ventured the astonishing assurance, to an audience of students and scholars, that the great points of Orthodox doctrine are elements of self-evident truth, which we accept as soon as they are presented to us, if our minds are open to self-evident truth.

But this is by no means the case, on any candid view of facts, nor, according to candid Orthodoxy, was it ever meant to be the case. The very idea of revelation has always been to present truths not in their nature self-evident, with special divine attestation of their claim upon man. On this basis, and on this alone, can an honest Orthodoxy stand. There is an appearance as of a kind of trick in the attempt to meet rationalism by asserting that Orthodox dogmas themselves rest upon simple reason. Neither in history nor in fact do they so rest; the only actual and the only adequate basis for them is authority, specially and divinely attested. If the method of authority is thrown away, dogmatic certitude and rigor must go with it, and we are among opinions only, free to choose those which seem to our best judgment most surely true. I repeat, it is a doubtful procedure, in any form of Orthodoxy whatever, to step out from behind authority, and to say to rationalism, "The true rationalism is Orthodoxy." The next step to this can only be confession that Orthodoxy has no authority after all, and that it may be wrong quite as likely as any other set of traditional opinions.

But the untruth in this becomes peculiarly conspicuous, when we consider whether rationalism does indeed endorse the Orthodox dogmas. It is not for those who have never attempted to depend strictly on reason to say with any great confidence what rationalism does endorse. Still less is it for such to say that it endorses dogmas which most avowed and all eminent rationalists reject. Dogmas which Emerson, Curtis, Bryant, Higginson, Lowell, Longfellow, Bancroft, Holmes, Whitney, Max Müller, Darwin, Tyndall, Huxley, Lubbock, and many other leading minds known to us all, do not think reasonable, cannot be truthfully said to be endorsed by mere reason. Those whom I have named may be in error,—that is not the point here; but at least they are representatives of a high activity of reason, and, when a preacher undertakes to read off a catalogue of dogmas with the assurance that reason unassisted endorses them, in the face of the fact that very many men of eminent reason totally deny this, he does what will pass for telling the truth "only among the relatively less informed and intelligent of the community," and what will be "borne with in a kind of contemptuous charity, or altogether neglected, by the men of culture who have been strongly developed on their moral side," and who do not like to see untruth and half-truth mismanaging the advocacy of religion.

And before an audience of students, a large number of whom are not dogmatic believers, and nearly all of whom are keenly alive to faulty statements of false reasoning, it seems to me peculiarly unfortunate to rehearse, rather baldly as well as briefly, a system of dogmas, with the mere assertion that each one of these is a self-evident truth. It would at best answer but a poor purpose with such an audience to use a whole system of theology in one sermon,—and

I presume the sermon to which I allude was chiefly meant for the theological faculty,—but still less does it answer to use it in so doubtful and delusive a way. If such a system is to be rehearsed at all in a pulpit effort, it should be on the conviction, deeply felt and intensely impressed, of its divine authority. There the preacher may stand as a commissioned prophet, armed with a divine preparation. But off that ground he parleys with an enemy to whom he must soon surrender. The feebly plausible pretence of coming in the name of reason only, even for a moment of truce, to enforce dogmas which have spurned reason for fifteen centuries, and which men of mere reason now generally spurn, is calculated to put the teaching so advocated at a dreadful disadvantage; that, namely, of untruth against truth.

SO SLOW TO CHANGE.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I think Mr. Pillsbury is right in saying that the changes made in popular religious teaching are far from keeping pace with the changes making in popular religious belief. That so much time should be required for a newly apprehended truth to leaven its way into the common creed of the masses, after it has been accepted and adopted by the more advanced minds among them, indicates something more than a mere lack of intellectual "iron in the blood;" it marks too plainly a wide-spread want of living, positive enthusiasm for truth.

Men and women of fully average intelligence and of independent thought and conscientious action in other matters will go on repeating the old religious formulas, apparently without a twinge of conscience, years after the faiths they once embodied have been superseded in their actual belief by the newer growths of the present.

Week after week, in the great congregation, men of learning and culture stand up and read: "For in six days the Lord made the earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day. Wherefore the Lord blessed the seventh day and hallowed it."

Do they believe this? Often in churches I have listened to the repetition of the Apostles' Creed with something very like a shudder, thinking of the solemn farce it must be to many of the worshippers. "I believe in Jesus Christ, his only Son our Lord, who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary,—was crucified, dead, and buried. He descended into hell; the third day he rose from the dead; he ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God, the Father Almighty. From thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead." If it could be that, as these utterances died upon the air, a solemn voice should fill the temple, and into every ear be dropped the question—"Stop! do you believe all this?"—what would be the effect upon that worshipping assembly? Probably not less than one-half would confess that they repeated the words by rote, simply because they had been so taught; without having ever for one moment considered whether they believed or not. Of the remainder, a few, mostly women and children, would answer without reservation that they fully believed. A few more would aver that, in some allegorical and spiritual sense, these "deep things" stand to them for the great truths their souls need. But upon how many faces would be suddenly manifest the blankness of utter disbelief!

And so of the dogma of regeneration through baptism, and the eternal wretchedness of the unconverted. To what miserable compromises with conscience, what distorting of the plain meaning of words, nay, to what actual lying, do they force a man who is beginning to taste the sweets of free thought, yet finds his utterance shackled by the empty forms of an effete theology!

A prominent lecturer once said of certain persons that they had "a craving appetite for truth which amounted almost to a mania." Oh that the disease might become contagious, and that indifferent and temporising religionists might be the first to catch it! H. L. B. R.

ANGELS AND CAPTAINS.—A visitor at one of our Sunday schools a short time ago perceived one little boy, covered with a perspiration of buttons, singing "I want to be an angel" with such vigor and earnestness that he grew red in the face. Watching for that boy to emerge from the portals of the sanctuary, the visitor called him aside. He told that boy that he had observed with what apparent heartfelt enthusiasm the scholar had screamed out his anxiety to become an angel. The visitor told that boy that he would give him half a dollar if he would say honestly if he wanted to be an angel, and, if not, what he would like to be. The scholar looked solemn for a moment, clutched his half dollar so as to be certain of that anyhow, and said he believed he would like nothing better than to be captain of a canal-boat. It seems to us wrong to compel these ambitious children to tell fibs while they are singing in Sunday school.—Max Adler.

In 1850, the Jesuit body throughout the world was little in excess of four thousand. At present there are nearly nine thousand members.

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 8.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, DECEMBER 14, 1872.

WHOLE No. 155.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELIZABETH ABBOT, Editor.
ABRAHAM WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.

OTATYCE BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, ROY CHARLES VOTSEY (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

[For THE INDEX.]

The Last Word.

A SERMON DELIVERED IN THE UNITARIAN CHURCH OF NORTH-UMBERLAND, PA., OCTOBER, 1872.

BY DAVID H. CLARK.

"Choose ye this day whom ye will serve."
JOSHUA, xxiv. 15.

The history of the Jews, not alone in respect to their political fortunes, but also their religious conceptions and worship, is one of ever-recurring modifications and transitions. It corresponds, in this particular, with that of every other people. It is not a history of uniform moral excellence, or of virtues or life always superior to that of others. It is one of wars, alike of victory and defeat; of revolutions in government, social anarchies, private feuds; of treachery and jealousy,—the baser as well as the better passions of our nature; the manifestation, in a word, of the common traits of our humanity.

Its religion, too, as I have intimated, though often regarded as a single and definite revelation, a fixed and finished system, was ever changing. If we should review the many hundreds of years which it includes, we should see that it was never the same at any considerably separated points of time; that new traditions became developed, new ideas and institutions, which caused the old to sink into less prominence, or altogether disappear. It both lost and contracted much through its contact with that of other nations and tribes, so that it became at length very different from what it was in the beginning. The text recalls to our minds an instance that bears upon this point. The Israelites not only retained, during their wanderings in the desert and conquest of Canaan, an attachment to the religion of the Egyptians, under the influence of which their lives hitherto had been passed, but also adopted to some extent that of the tribes with whom they mingled. This was a great trial to their leaders, whose continual aim was to bind them in closer and stronger allegiance to the God that had brought them out of Egypt.

"It came to pass," therefore, we are told, "a long time after that the Lord had given rest unto Israel from all their enemies round about, that Joshua, waxed old and stricken in years, called for all Israel, and for their elders, and for their heads, and for their judges, and for their officers," that he might remind them of the experiences through which they had been led to their present possessions, and counsel and admonish them in respect to the future. The conclusion of his address was as follows: "I have given you a land for which you did not labor, and cities which you built not, and ye dwell in them. Of the vine yard and olive yards which ye planted not, do ye eat. Now, therefore, fear the Lord and serve him in sincerity and in truth, and put away the gods which your fathers served that were on the other side of the flood and in Egypt, and serve ye the Lord. And if it seem evil unto you to serve the Lord, choose ye this day whom ye will serve, whether the gods which your fathers served that were on the other side of the flood, or the gods of the Amorites, in whose land ye dwell; but as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

There are times in all human life, and not unfrequently, that demand a somewhat similar and no less peremptory decision, which force us to a correspondent extremity, and bid us choose between two conflicting courses of action and sympathy in tones too imperative and unconciliatory to be evaded,—whether we will surrender our lives and hearts to an unworthy and false veneration, or to an ennobling homage and reverence; to the persuasions of expediency, self-ease, and the favor of others or to devotion to truth, unselfish courage, and sincerity.

I am but representing, my friends, my own experience during the week which has just passed. A critical point, it appears to me, has been reached in my relation to this church and congregation,—a condition of things which I must meet manfully, if I would preserve your respect or my own. I am informed, in a manner too unmistakable to be questioned, that the sermon I preached last Sunday was a cause of offence to some who were present. I am further informed that, if I continue to preach here certain views and sentiments it contained, I am threatened with the withdrawal of those who were displeased from my preaching and support.

This is something from which, I assure you, I should have been glad, if it had been possible, to have escaped. It is a position, in all respects, of sadness and pain. But sentiments and opinions, when they are conscientiously entertained, and are the result of earnest study and thought, are something which the public teacher cannot put aside at others' dictation, become a part of his habits of thought and character; and there is no more justice in another's censure because he holds them than there is if he is censured for the features of his face or the color of his hair. Nay, more; if he believes that the opinions which he holds are the truth, he will feel himself impelled, if he is an honest and earnest person, to utter them regardless of all intimidations and threats that may confront him. It will be impossible for him to equivocate in respect to them—to conceal or smother them. Any other course is mental slavery,—the lowest and meanest form of servitude into which a person can fall.

It seems, therefore, necessary at this juncture that a better understanding should be attained than at present exists between us, if our union is to be preserved. And I know of no better way of effecting this than for me to frankly state to you, in as clear and intelligible a manner as I am able, and withal in what is meant to be the utmost kindness of spirit, my exact position at this time in regard to the points to which exception has been taken; and to ask you to decide at once what course you will pursue. I would rather take up to-morrow the pick and the spade, and dig on the railroad, with such companions as I should find there, or engage in the humblest occupation, than to stand here on Sunday afraid to utter what I believe.

I alluded last Sunday to the Bible. I have frequently done so in a way which has subjected me to unfavorable comment. I am impelled, therefore, to say at this time that I regard the popular view of it, both as held by those who assume to be Orthodox people and also as held by some Unitarians, as an idolization of it, a superstition that must fall before the tests of reason and modern enlightenment,—a source of much mischief and an impediment in the way of progress. It is utterly unreasonable, I hold, to suppose that certain portions of the Bible possess any peculiar sacredness or spiritual authority; that the incest and lust and inhumanity associated with the lives of many of those who are referred to frequently as the worthies of the Scriptures, do not disqualify them for being treated as models of character for the civilization of to-day; that their ideas of the universe and God, the duties and purpose of human existence, are not lower every way than ours; that the books of the Bible are inspired in any other way than are the sacred books of the various religions of the world. Nay, more, it is impossible for me to regard that inspiration, even in its grandest and most spiritual utterances (and there is no book with which I am acquainted that to my mind excels it in such utterances) as different in its nature from that of the products of genius in all their varieties in every age. Even the New Testament is mixed up all through (as is very plain to see if it is read with a critical and unbiased mind) with crude ideas and superstitions which greatly impair its application to the circumstances and life of to-day.

Now what ought we to do about these things? Ought we to refuse to admit them? Ought we to assume it as otherwise, because there are those around us who do not see them, or are unwilling to? Ought we not to endeavor to lead people to a perception of the truth in regard to this book as well as everything else, rather than, with artful subterfuge or timid preference, feign what we do not more than half believe, while the intelligence of the age looks upon us with derision and contempt? It will require some heroism, I know, to take such a stand, and maintain it in the midst of the uncritical habits of thought which prevail around us. It will require some indifference to the judgments of popular ignorance and prejudice. But what is religion for, if not for this? What is Unitarianism, if it does not infuse us with such a spirit? Nay what is Christianity itself?

I come now to speak of Jesus and Christianity. And, first of all, I am impelled to say, I do not believe that Jesus was a perfect human being; I do not believe that there ever was one in the sense in which the word is used in this connection. I do not think that the record of his life shows him to have been such in every particular. I cannot believe that he represents, though unparalleled it may be, in the grandeur, loftiness, and purity of his character, the complete ideal of our humanity; the fullest development to which it is possible for our natures with their varied capacities, intellectual, moral, and spiritual, to attain. No human being, not the greatest, whether sage or saint, that ever walked the earth, has been able to do this. To be able to do it would indeed lift such a one out of the life of humanity. It would make him a demigod, at least, suggesting all the arguments which at once arise against such a being as a pattern for us. The utmost that any great person can do for us is to enlighten and inspire us through certain of our faculties. He is never able to influence us through all, nor to lead us in each direction to the same extent. It is thus that we need many masters or teachers. No one is competent to give us the final lesson of life or to advance us to the limit of our possible education. We read that Jesus was tempted in all points like ourselves, yet without sin. We read also that "there is no man that liveth upon the earth and sinneth not;" and our experience confirms this last affirmation. It is seen, therefore, that not only must Jesus have been tempted in all points like ourselves, but also have sinned to have entered wholly into our nature and experience.

But was he tempted in all points like ourselves? Did that single, solitary life, never passing beyond the confines of Judea, of not more than half the frequent duration of human life—if the account of him that is generally accepted is true—comprehend all the experience and all the temptation possible to man, amid all the varieties and peculiarities of condition and temperament in every age and land for all future time? This appears to me impossible. Be it remembered that some of the common relations of life he never filled. He was without a family, and therefore knew nothing through personal experience of the peculiar duties, cares, and vexations which it includes. He knew nothing through personal experience of the relations of husband and wife, father and mother, and so of many other spheres of relationship, intercourse, and experience common to human life—to your life and mine. Furthermore, it is evident that Jesus was affected with some of the erroneous ideas and beliefs current in his time. It is evident that he believed and represented himself to be the Jewish Messiah, and that the conception was something quite different to his mind, and to those who became his followers, from that which the Church has presented. It is very clear that Jesus believed, or appeared to believe, in the existence of a personal devil, and of evil spirits that were the cause of various maladies, as was then the current belief. It is very clear also, I think, that he predicted his second coming—with the destruction of the world and a great judgment day within that generation.

I pass now from the person of Jesus to what he taught, to the religion which has its centre in his career among men. And here let me say that we are better prepared, with the facilities which modern scholarship supplies, to form a correct and intelligent appreciation of Christianity, especially in its relation to other religions, and other moral and intellectual systems, than ever before. Until within the last fifty years, I may perhaps say even the last twenty-five years, knowledge in respect to the other religions of the world was but scanty and meagre. It was the custom of the ancient Greeks to regard all other people as barbarians. With a similar contempt Christianity has looked on all other religions and systems of thought than its own. The languages in which the sacred books of other religions are printed were formerly but little known as compared with the present. These books themselves were much less accessible than they have in recent time become. The effect of this increase of knowledge, in respect to the other religions of the world, has been to disclose a greater agreement between them and Christianity than was hitherto admitted or even supposed. It goes to show that there are few of the doctrines or precepts of Jesus which had not been, in one form or another, by one teacher or another, taught before.

I have brought together a collection of brief quotations which I will introduce at this point, gleaned from such resources as I have at hand; not so complete or forcible as they might be, but sufficiently so, I think, to confirm what I have said. We are told, by those versed in these subjects, that the underlying conception of the religion of Egypt, even with all the varieties of the objects of its worship, was that of the Divine Unity and Spirituality—declaring God to be, in words almost precisely the same as these in which Jehovah is reported to have been revealed to Moses, "I am the I am." It was also maintained in the religion of that people, "that salvation cannot be expected from the justice or mercy of the Supreme Judge, unless an atoning sacrifice to him is made by a divine being;"—"that a god or man, or a being half god and half a man, once lived on earth, born of an earthly mother but without an earthly father." There is a papyrus in the Imperial Library at Paris, brought from Egypt, which has been supposed by competent authority to be the oldest book in the world. It consists of a collection of proverbs. Among these occur the following: "The bad man's life is what the wise know to be death. What we say in secret is known to him who made our interior nature." "He who made us is present with us though we are alone." "Many of the virtues," says James Freeman Clarke, in his Ten Great Religions of the World, "which we are apt to suppose a monopoly of Christian culture appear as the ideal of these old Egyptians. Brugsch says a thousand voices from the tombs of Egypt declare this. One inscription reads: 'He loved his father, he honored his mother, he loved his brethren, and never went from his home in bad temper. He never preferred the great man to the low one.'" An inscription concerning a priest at Saïs reads: "I honored my father, I esteemed my mother, I loved my brothers, I found graves for the unburied dead, I instructed little children, I took care of orphans as though they were my own children. For great misfortunes were on Egypt in my time, and on this city of Saïs." A king's tomb at Thebes bears these words: "I lived in truth, and fed my soul with justice. What I did to men was done in peace, and how I loved God, God and my heart well know. I have given bread to the hungry, water to the thirsty, clothes to the naked, and a shelter to the stranger."

The ancient sacred books of India are said to contain these sentences: "There is one living and true God, everlasting, without parts or passion; of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness; the maker and preserver of all things." "Any place where the mind of man can be undisturbed is suitable for the worship of the Supreme Being." The Code of Manu, a thousand years before the time of Christ, has these words: "The wise man must faithfully discharge all moral duties, even though he does not constantly perform the ceremonies of religion." "The soul itself is its own witness and its own refuge. Offend not thy conscious soul, the supreme internal witness of men." "There are two roads which conduct to perfect virtue—to be true and to do no evil to any creature." "Men faithless to the truth, however much they may seek supreme happiness, will not obtain it, even though they offer a thousand sacrifices." From other sacred books of India these passages may be added: "Is this one of our tribe or a stranger? Is the calculation of the narrow-minded; but to those of a noble disposition the earth itself is one family." "What is religion?" says the same book: "Tenderness toward all creatures." "Hatred does not cease by hatred; hatred ceases by love."

The four points of the Persian creed are said to be—"To believe in one God and hope for mercy from him alone; to believe in a future state of existence; to do as you would be done by; to believe in Zoroaster as lawgiver, and to hold his writings sacred." "Turn not away from a sinner, but look upon him with compassion," says one of its sacred books. This passage is from another: "All good do I accept at thy command, O God, and think, and speak, and do it. I believe in the pure law; by every good work seek I forgiveness from all sins. I keep pure for myself the serviceable work and abstinence from the unprofitable. I keep pure the six powers,—thought, speech, work, memory, mind, and understanding. According to thy will am I able to accomplish, O Accomplisher of Good, thy honor, with good thoughts, good words, good works."

The religion of China inculcates absolute sincerity, reverence, purity, and tenderness. It teaches that by tenderness and purity one may become as a little child. It says: "Recompense injury with kindness." From an essay by Mr. Higginson, upon the Sympathy of Religions, I quote a short extract, further to illustrate its spirit: "My doctrine," said Confucius, "is simple and easy to understand. It consists only in having the heart right and in loving one's neighbor as one's self." "Is there not one word," said one of his disciples to him, "which may serve as a rule of practice for all one's life?" "Is not reciprocity such a word?" He answered, "Do not to another what thou wouldst not he should do to thee." This is the sum of the law, which also occurs in the Jewish Talmud: "The wise man," says the Chinese Lao-tse, "avenges his injuries with benefits."

The distinctive doctrines of Christianity, as compared with other religions, have been supposed to be the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. But an acquaintance with the religious conceptions of the ancient world will show us that it cannot claim these as original inculcations. Thus Marcus Aurelius, the Roman emperor and stoic philosopher, speaks of God as the Father of men and the Preserver of the world. So Philo, a Jew, living before the time of Christ, says: "One Creator, one Father, one Master of the Universe." "The best of prayers and the end of happiness is to attain a likeness to God." He also said: "Judge not your neighbor until you have stood in his place." "The cynic cares for all, as a father, a brother, a minister of Zeus, the common parent,"—are words ascribed to Epictetus; as also these: "One is not to call himself a citizen of Athens or Corinth, but of the universe, and a son of God." Cicero thus gives utterance to the like sentiment: "Men were created for mutual help; cherish the common bond of the human race." And again: "One who knows himself will feel that he is a citizen of the whole world, holding all united by Nature his own relatives." Seneca says: "Humanity counts that good for one's self which will be a good for another." "All have one origin; none is nobler than another, save by pre-eminence in right and good ways." So in the Old Testament, notwithstanding the austerity, vindictiveness, and cruelty which are often ascribed to God, he is frequently represented as a father to men; as for example in this instance: "Have we not all one father? Hath not one God created us?"

There has been much speculation with regard to the origin of Jesus and the circumstances amidst which his life and character were developed. In Harriet Martineau's Eastern Life, Past and Present, there is the following reference to the Jewish sect, the Essenes, who flourished in the time of Christ, which is to my mind very suggestive upon this point:—

"It is impossible to enter in any degree into the mind of Christ without considering how large an element of his thought was the life and doctrine of the Essenes. When we read of them in Josephus or Philo, we see reflected back, as in a mirror, the life of the gospel; or at least the idea of that life which was held by the early Christians. The Sermon on the Mount might be taken as one long blessing on the Essenes: the non-resistance, the abjurers of property, the humble, the mortified, the industrious, the charitable. The leading object, the central purpose of the Essenes, was that of fulfilling the moral ideal of the Law. Their societies undoubtedly formed the model of the first Christian communities, and of subsequent monastic institutions."

"They held their goods in common, forbidding a man to have two cloaks or two staves, and not allowing him to be in want of one. . . . They believed that the hairs of men's heads were all numbered and every moment of their thoughts determined by an immutable providence. They held that men are truly and practically brethren under the paternity of God. They refused to call any one master upon the earth, denouncing slavery and every kind of servitude. All political action was discountenanced; giving the cheek to the smiter rather than raising the hand was inculcated. With this went unlimited forgiveness of injuries. They might have had for their motto the glorious text of the Koran—'To endure and to pardon is the wisdom of life.' They taught that the best temper for man consisted in these affections—love of God, love of the truth, and love of man; and that the best employments corresponded to these, namely, contemplation and healing the bodies and souls of men. Hence they called themselves, and were called, physicians of bodies and souls. While abstaining from marriage, they opened their arms to children out of love for their purity, as well as compassion for their helplessness. They might have inscribed over their doors the words: 'Suffer little children to come unto us, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven;' and the children did go to them and were taken in and cherished as were the hungry, the naked, the sick, and miserable. They repudiated oaths, practised the utmost plainness of speech, thinking that all exaggeration of their yea and nay came of evil."

I have endeavored to indicate by this collection of quotations that I do not regard Christianity, or in other words the teachings of Jesus, to be exclusively an original system, having no relation to antecedent systems of morals and religion, as has been very generally supposed and taught. I believe rather, in the words of another, that "Christianity was in the air," in the intellectual and spiritual life of the time; that it was preceded by influences and causes involved in the general drift of human life in that age,—like all great revolutions in society and civilization; and that Jesus but received and reflected what was best and richest in its thought and spirit, illustrating this fact in a life of wonderful spiritual perception, self-sacrifice, and purity.

Do you say that this deprecates the person of Jesus and his mission? I answer that it rather increases their value. In removing the abnormal and superstitious associations, with which he has been invested, we but bring him into closer relation to human sympathy; we but render him more interesting and attractive. Do you say that such views are destructive of religion? I ask, Does not God remain—still infinite in his nature and perfections, with his providence as comprehensive, pervading, tender, and beneficent as before? Do not all high aspirations remain—all noble intuitions and instincts, all beautiful sensibilities and sympathies, which the Creator has caused to spring up within us? Nay, more; may we not still draw inspiration and guidance, not alone from Jesus, but alike from all the great sages and teachers of the past?

I have had persons ask me, "What is the use of religion if there is no endless hell?" But those who have outgrown that crude belief know that religion loses nothing of its significance or worth because it drops this relic of old superstitions. So is it in regard to the doctrine of the Trinity. Have Unitarians lost anything in the spiritual power of the life of Jesus because they have been unwilling to confound his person with that of the Almighty? Will not their record, as compared with that of other bodies of Christians, show that they have presented as genuine claims as any to be regarded his disciples?

Do you say this is not Unitarianism? Will any one give me a definition of what it is? It is a denomination without a uniform statement of belief, that is ostensibly committed to free thought; but, as it turns out, sometimes only within certain Christian limitations. Whom will you name as its exponent? Here are Drs. Bellows, Sears, Robbins, and such as these at one end; and Dr. Bartol, Robert Collyer, Mr. Alger, Chadwick, Ames, and such as these, at the other. Last winter Dr. Hedge preached a sermon, in a course of sermons in Boston by different Unitarian clergymen, on Christian mythology, maintaining that Christianity has its mythology, as well as what are called the Pagan religions, and that it is to be traced back even to its beginning.

More recently, in June last, the Rev. Mr. Hall, of Worcester, in a sermon before the Alumni of the Divinity School of Cambridge, took the ground that theology should henceforth be treated as a science, placed upon the same level with the other sciences, and subjected to the same free discussion and examination. This position is precisely that of the Free Religious Association; and THE INDEX has complimented the sermon by publishing it entire.

But what matter whether these views are Unitarianism or not? There is a more pertinent question: Are they the truth? Truth is superior to parties and sects, which should be but auxiliaries in its service. The Unitarian denomination has assumed to be committed to reason; and Dr. Hedge has said, "Between reason and Rome there is no middle ground." Shall Unitarianism stop forever where it is? Shall it, snail-like, withdraw itself into the shell of a stationary conservatism, whenever a tendency is manifested to urge it forward? If such is to be its character, let it cease henceforth to charge this fault, as it has been so wont to do, upon other sects. Let it cease to proclaim its superiority in this particular. We complain of the intolerance and bigotry of these sects; and yet I confess I have met some Unitarians as unwilling to consider or read anything which did not coincide with their declared belief as the straightest of those about us.

It may be asked, If the views I have presented are so obvious, why do not the great minds of the Church see them and proclaim them? Amusing simplicity! Reform in these directions, my friends, does not begin with this class. They do but conform to what at last they are compelled to. They do not, as a general rule, acquaint themselves with the proof which leads to such conclusions. They are more interested in building up and strengthening the sects to which they belong. They are too much attached to their seven, and ten, and twenty thousand dollar talaries, and comfortable living, to give much time or attention to unpalatable or unpopular truths. No, my friends, the work of reform goes on ever among the untrammelled and independent outside of the Church. The heretics and unbelievers, the great thinkers of the age, those who are stirring most its inherited opinions, who are making the deepest impression upon the thought of the time, are not in the Church. It is almost impossible to point to a single mind of the ecclesiastical class which occupies a prominent place among the real intellectual leaders of to-day. We shall be compelled to turn for such to those who possess little or no connection with ecclesiastical institutions; to the walks of literature, philosophy, and science; and then we shall find that the tendency in regard to religious ideas sets all in the direction of my position.

But it is said that if I proclaim these views, I shall drive people away from me. I shall drive only those away who are intolerant, who are unwilling the world shall get beyond their conclusions, and between whom and a liberal faith there is no natural or genuine harmony of spirit. If I drive some away, I am sure I shall attract others; or I shall win from them at least a greater respect than if, while holding such opinions, I timidly conceal them.

For, my friends, I am persuaded that a very large amount of the indifference to the Church, which is everywhere apparent, which keeps so many away from it of the most intelligent and thoughtful in every community, is to be attributed to the fact that the pulpit has so little to teach; that its utterances are to so large an extent a repetition of worn-out platitudes which leave the mind as vacant and inactive as before. But more important even than the teaching of the preacher is often the influence of his spirit. It is not alone because of his theological expositions or his discoveries in science that his memory is cherished whose name we have inscribed upon these walls [Dr. Priestley]. Some of these have become obsolete already, or are known and properly appreciated chiefly by theologians and scholars; but there are few familiar with his history who do not know and venerate him as a distinguished exemplar of the heroic and martyr spirit, through the devotion which he preserved to his honest convictions even at the cost of exile and persecution. It is the want of courage and a disposition to move forward in the line of progress, to recognize and accept the new truth of the age, which retards more than anything else the progress of Unitarianism, and has already driven out so many of its most cultivated and brightest minds, and is continually increasing the list. It is out of this class to no inconsiderable extent that has sprung up the Free Religious Association, comprising among its leaders those who were once of the Unitarian ranks, but are of it no longer,—an association organized on a broader principle of co-operation and fellowship, that of absolute freedom of thought in respect to religion. Already, though not of more than five years existence, it has made itself widely known and felt in this country and in Europe. The Index Association, a product of the same movement, has nearly completed the raising of a fund of one hundred thousand dollars to put upon a secure basis THE INDEX, the weekly paper which is the organ of the movement. So you perceive that heresy does not die of anathema and excommunication. But, irrespective of the effect of my utterances upon the prosperity of this church, it seems to me that, if the spirit of its founder has so far departed that nothing is to be tolerated from the pulpit but what is already accepted and believed, it will not be a very great calamity even if it goes to pieces.

I am asked, Why not preach as Channing and Priestley did, and such as these? No one has a greater veneration for these names than I have; but as well might some one in their time have pointed them to those behind them as their example. There can be nothing more absurd than for conservative Unitarians of to-day to call themselves Channing Unitarians. They are certainly not such in spirit. Channing was one of the most intense radicals of his time. He was especially so in regard to slavery—a whole generation in advance of his denomination.

It is said again, Why not withhold these obnoxious views and preach practical sermons? But religion has its theoretical or intellectual side as well as its practical or moral one. Nay, the one is so involved in the other that it is impossible to separate them. And how is it possible for an earnest and thoughtful mind to be indifferent to the great critical questions of to-day which are more and more forced upon the attention? Moreover, my friends, it is one of the most marvellous things in the preacher's experience what an enormous amount of practical preaching congregations can stand without producing any perceptible effect! The sermons which are called so good, so comforting, so beautiful, are the very ones which abound frequently where the people are the most worldly and fashionable. We need what sets us to thinking—what forces us to critical surveys and examinations of our opinions—what stirs us to heroic virtue and self-denial, as well as that which simply appeals to the imagination, sensibilities, and feelings. Mr. Curtis, in one of his lectures, describes one of these congregations whose special delight is practical preaching, somewhat thus, as it dispenses: "That was a fine sermon," says one; "the Doctor really surpassed himself to-day." "Why, what a love of a bonnet you have!" "Charley, how your boots shine!"

But, my friends, I have not jumped at these conclusions. They are the result of years of fearless study and research, of the expenditure for years of all my surplus earnings upon books to enable me better to elucidate these problems,—from the time when, a mere boy, I took my place with the new converts in a Methodist revival meeting, passing eventually out of that denomination into one of what I regarded larger freedom, the Universalist, and then to the Unitarian, through many vicissitudes and trials, until now. How much have your opinions cost you? What has been the process through which they have been verified? How many headaches have they caused you in endeavoring to prove whether they were true or otherwise? Most of you came into possession of them through inheritance, and amid associations sufficiently honorable to render your fidelity to them easy. No social relations have been sacrificed for them; no one has been impoverished. Do not think, my friends, that I am insensible to kindness; that I would recklessly sever the ties of genuine affection that bind me to this congregation. I acknowledge all these claims upon me. But there are considerations more imperative. I must be true to myself. Ah, my friends, how many a minister has been killed by kindness! Should not I strive to escape the peril? The embroidered slippers, and handsome dressing-gown, and pariah tea-parties, and sponge cake, have stolen away many a minister's manhood. They have made him not only weak in mind, but craven in spirit.

I submit, then, my friends, this frank avowal of my opinions. In the words of Luther: "Here I stand; I cannot do otherwise; God help me." If after the declaration I have made you can consent to listen to me, and labor with me still, I promise a greater devotion to all the opportunities of my vocation than ever before. If this cannot be, we separate to pursue henceforth divergent paths.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

OUTSIDE THE CHURCH.

The dark, square belfry tower and massive walls
Fling huge, quaint shadows on the vivid grass;
Through Gothic archways the blue sky is seen;
On the carved stone the generous sunshine falls
With warm, brown tints; all about the oriel's glass
It casts strange rainbow stains upon the green.

Open the jewelled, pictured windows afloat,
That the cool freshness of the soft-aded morn
May enter in; while outward float to me
The deep-voiced organ-chorde, the full-choired chant
Above all simple, rural sounds upborne,
And the fine incense's sultry fragrance.

No grief, no pain those sacred tones express:
Why do they overflow the eyes with tears?
No troublous discord, no pathetic plaint—
They sing the perfect peace of holiness,
Uplift above the reaches of men's fears,
Of grave, great joy and undisturbed content.

The thin, clear echo of the last note dies—
Nay, rather soars beyond our narrow ken
Into a sphere more lofty, vast, and wide—
Leaving fulfilled with tears the cheated eyes,
And the foiled heart with longings vague and vain,
Nameless and never to be satisfied.

Where is the utter peace those chants suggest?
Have yonder folk who kneel within at last
Reached its pure source and quaffed the waters calm?
I almost deem that that's its perfect rest,
Disaster, doubt, and evil overpast,
As from without I listen to their psalm.

O Church, to yet one more thy gateways open,
Who needs all comforts thou canst offer these—
Love, pity, pardon, charity and prayer,
The far-off prospect of a light, a hope
In the fulfilment of life's promise,
A strengthening breath of some diviner air.

O Mother-Church, what solace, what reply,
Hast thou for me? No, I have stood within
The cloistered limitations of thy walls,
With honest efforts, earnest piety,
Imploping refuge from distress and sin,
The grace that on thine own elected falls.

Wearied of those unceasing doubts of mine,
Harassed, perplexed, with one great longing filled:
To hear the mastering word, to yield, adore,
Conquered and happy, crying, "I am thine!"
Uplift, sustain, and lead me like a child,
I will repose in thee forevermore."

I waited, but the message did not come;
No voice addressed my reason, and my heart
Shrank to itself in chill discouragement.
To me the ancient oracles were dumb,
The lifeless rites no comfort could impart,
Charged with no answer for my discontent.

Midst blank and stupid faces I could see,
Crowned with strange joy, made beautiful with peace,
Pale brows of women, rapt and fervent-eyed;
And grave men glorying in humility,
Absorbed in quaint and child-like services,
Sincerely moved, devout and satisfied.

The tempered light of many a serene
With the stained sunshine: the dim atmosphere,
Dreamy with incense: the organ's rich sound,—
Each sense with these was feasted and content.
Neglected still the hungry heart was here,
And no response my mind or spirit found.

Estranged, unsatisfied, I leaned forth
(Not there again to look for peace and rest)
Into the broad white light and large sweet air;
And lo! the spring-tide beauty of the earth
Touched tenderly the chord untraced, unguessed,
And all my spirit melted in a prayer.

Here will I seek my peace, here rears my mind,
Knowing "God's comforts are no ill thing."
Oh simple souls who yearn with no reply,
Too reverent for religions, ye may find
All patience, all assurance life can bring,
In this free prospect, 'neath this open sky!

Here where I stand, religion seems a part
Of all the moving, reeling, sunlit earth;
All things are sacred, in each bush a God;
No miracles accept the pious heart,
Where all is miracle; of holy word
Seems the plain ground our daily feet have trod.

As the majestic choral chant I hear,
The low, impressive organ symphonies,
And with rapt eyes the unfathomable skies I search,
All earth-born troubles wane and disappear,
And I can feel, amidst my reveries,
That not alone I stand outside the church.

EMMA LAZARUS.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at OXFORD HALL, 81, Cliff Street, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

CASH RECEIPTS.

For the week ending December 7.—George Schneider, $3; Henry Greenbaum, $3; C. A. Morse, $2; W. H. Ovington, $3; Miss Alice Norton, $3; Dr. A. B. Brockway, $3; Charles Watson, $3; Mrs. H. Judd, $3; Miss A. Hall, $3; Eben McArthur, $3; Frank Strong, $1.10; Thos. H. Ash, $3; Perseus Desair, $3; Richard Butcher, 50 cts.; E. Turner, 50 cts.; Lucian Moses, $2; Mrs. H. C. Gilbre, $3; Wm. H. Bradbury, $3; Henry Huff, 50 cts.; W. C. Harion, $1.50; Ernest Blaukenberg, $4.40; C. W. Wendie, $3.10; John C. Hayner, $1; Toledo Printing Co., $20.00; T. E. Peck, $20; E. M. Whipple, $20.00; H. B. Richardson & Co., $23.40; P. E. Abbot, $24.00; A. Bell, $1; S. F. Woodard, $20.00; M. L. Holbrook, $10.00; H. Evans, 20 cts.; H. G. Neubert, $20.00; J. Banta, $2; John Smeihorst, $3; Peter Leelin, $3; E. S. Bunker, $2; J. S. Post, $3; Joseph Steele, $3; Henry W. Stone, $3; C. Brown, Jr., $1.50; I. Kahn, 50 cts.; Chas. W. Pierce, $3; James L. Pierce, $3; Henry A. Hannon, $3; Wm. C. Shannon, $2; T. S. Forrester, $3; H. B. Richardson, 10 cts.; P. Bradley, $3; M. R. Osypow, $3; E. E. Wright, $3; Jon. Heleland, $3; C. K. Corbin, $3; Mrs. K. Ketchum, 50 cts.; H. Martin, $3; J. H. Burfield, $3; J. M. Smith, $1.30; J. Jones & Co., $2; B. Liebetradler, 60 cts.; S. G. Hayner, $3; S. Corner, $3; Mrs. S. B. Berry, $15.00; Miss E. T. Cowperthwait, $15.00; John H. Clark, $3; Wm. H. Ford, 20 cts.; Samuel H. Seaman, $3; W. T. S. Forrester, $3; P. Buchanan, $3; Henry N. Stone, $20.00; Miss S. C. Tyler, 25 cts.; R. L. Baker, $3; A. J. Wolf, 25 cts.; Mrs. S. E. Gilman, 10 cts.; Wm. H. Ovington, $15.00; W. F. Bickles, $20.00; Chas. A. Gurley, $20.00; Jonathan Sawyer, $10.00; L. T. Osborn, $10.00; J. T. Sutton, $10.00; J. D. Zimmerman, $10.00; Phoebe A. Zimmerman, $10.00; Chas. W. Pierce, $10.00; Mrs. Van Scooter, 20 cts.; A. C. Harlan, 10 cts.; C. S. Pearce, 10 cts.; J. A. Sells, 60 cts.; M. S. Severance, 25 cts.; E. B. Ward, $30.00; Lakshy Suderland, $10.00; J. G. Richardson, $10.00.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and to other receipt unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—THE INDEX is payable in advance. Its friends should not be offended if the paper is stopped at the expiration of their terms as indicated by the mail-tag. We have no means of knowing whether they wish it continued or not except by the receipt or non-receipt of the subscription price.

N. B.—Please examine the ADDRESS and DATE on your INDEX mail-tag, and report at once any error in either.

N. B.—If your INDEX mail-tag is not changed within three weeks after receiving your subscription, please notify us immediately. But do not write before the expiration of that time.

N. B.—Postage on THE INDEX is five cents per quarter, dating from receipt of the first number, payable in advance at the place of delivery.

RECEIVED.

LIFE AND CHARACTER OF THE REV. SYLVESTER JUDD. Boston: CHURCH, NICHOLS & Co. New York: C. S. FRANCIS & Co. 1834. 12mo. pp. 531.

RADICAL DISCOVERIES ON RELIGIOUS SUBJECTS. Delivered in Music Hall, Boston, Mass., by WILLIAM DENTON. Boston: Published by WILLIAM DENTON. For sale by WILLIAM WHITE & Co., 128 Washington Street. 1873. 12mo. pp. 232.

A CHANCE FOR HIMSELF: OR, JACK HAZARD AND HIS TREASURES. By J. T. THURBERG. Author of "Jack Hazard and His Fortunes," etc. Boston: JAMES R. OGDON & Co. 1874. pp. 268.

MAJOR JONES'S COCKNEY: Detailed, with other Scenes, Incidents, and Adventures, in a Series of Letters by himself. Revised and Enlarged. To which are added Thirteen Hundred Humorous Sketches. With Illustrations by CART. New York: D. APPLETON & Co. 1873. pp. 226.

BEERIE. A Novel. By JULIA KAVANAUGH. New York: D. APPLETON & Co.

THE DOCTOR'S DILEMMA. A Novel. By HELEN STRETTON. New York: D. APPLETON & Co.

OLD AND NEW. December, 1873. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS, 143 Washington Street.

ELGIN ALMANAC. 1873. JOHN COOPER & SON, Cooperstown, Texas.

THE RELIGIOUS MAGAZINE AND MONTHLY REVIEW. December, 1873. Boston: L. C. BOWLER, 38 Brimfield Street.

THE ALDINE. December, 1873. JAMES SUTTON & Co. 28 Maiden Lane, New York.

THE FREEMASON. November, 1873. St. Louis: St. Louis BOOK AND NEWS COMPANY, 307 North Fourth Street.

Digitized by Google

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.
The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 30, 1873. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED elsewhere, Nine Hundred Shares, $90,000
ARNOLD TANKER, New York, N. Y.,	One " 100
A. M. LEE, " " " " " "	" " 100
PARDON ARMISTON, Lawrence, Mass.,	" " 100
Mrs. H. E. PARKINS, Dover, N. H.,	" " 100
Mrs. EMILY BUCK, New York, N. Y.,	" " 100
J. GOLDMARK, " " " " " "	" " 100
CHAS. A. GUBLEY, Polaski, N. Y.,	Two " 200
ALEX COCHRAN, Franklin, Pa.,	Five " 500
Mrs. L. M. PLUMMER, Newbury, Mass.,	One " 100
NATHANIEL LITTLE, " " " " " "	" " 100
NATHANIEL LITTLE, JR., " " " " " "	" " 100
CHARLES SCHMIDT, Oberlin, Ohio,	" " 100
S. NATHANSON, New York, N. Y.,	" " 100
ANDREW E. WHITMORE, Ill.,	" " 100
CHAS. BUFFUM, Lynd, Mass.,	" " 100
Mrs. A. F. CURTIS, Cambridgeport, " "	" " 100
J. H. McDUFFIE, " " " " " "	" " 100
Mrs. M. E. BRID, New York, N. Y.,	" " 100
L. E. BROCKWAY, Brooklyn, " "	One " 100
A. LOOM, Philadelphia, Pa.,	" " 100
PETER LESTER, Germantown, " "	" " 100
R. M. WHIFFLE, Chicago, Ill.,	Two " 200
Mrs. S. B. HERRT, Washington, D. C.,	One " 100
Miss E. T. CONVENTSWAIT, " "	" " 100

$90,000

The Index.

DECEMBER 14, 1872.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. His columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

BUSINESS NOTICE.—All communications without exception, on all matters pertaining to the paper, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, DRAWER 28, TOLEDO, OHIO." All cheques, drafts, and post office money orders, should be made payable to "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION." No responsibility is assumed for loss of money or neglect in the fulfilment of orders, unless these directions are STRICTLY COMPLIED WITH.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—THE INDEX will be enlarged to sixteen pages at the commencement of its fourth volume, Jan. 1, 1873. After Sept. 28, 1872, the price of subscription will be $3.00 a year in advance. But every subscriber, new or old, who remits $3.00 at once will be credited with a year's subscription from Jan. 1, and will meantime receive the paper free, if not already paid for.

Mr. Abbot is suddenly called East by the dangerous sickness of a very near relative. All business requiring his personal attention must await his return. Correspondents will please take notice.

FREE RELIGION AND SOCIAL REFORM.
VII.

1. Free self-government of the individual by reason and conscience:
2. Universal fellowship and organic union of the race on the simple basis of a common humanity:
3. Mutual devotion of the race and the individual, each to each:
4. Conformity of all the conditions of human life, individual and social, to the eternal laws of Nature.

These four great ideas are involved, as already emphatically stated, in that profound faith in Nature and Man which is the essence, power, and inspiration of Free Religion; and Free Religion is but another name for the spirit of the age. There is no "vagueness" about these ideas to any one who can comprehend a general principle. They lead directly to the adoption of universal, integral, and continuous education as the one fixed policy of social reform; and they constitute in themselves the object to which all education should be directed. That is, wise education can have no other aim than to elevate these four ideas to the rank of the supreme, universally recognized, and universally obeyed laws of all human life.

It is not enough, however, to say that education must be universal, integral, and continuous. The word to most minds suggests only the training and culture given by means of some system of direct instruction, public or private; but in its widest scope it covers what might properly be called social education. There are general agencies of great power which are too seldom considered in their educational aspect, as standing to the community at large in somewhat the same relation as that occupied to a child by his instructor; and these general agencies bring their influence to bear primarily not upon individuals, but upon men in the mass, who are often quite unconscious of it. Among them are to be included great institutions of all kinds, political, industrial, commercial, military, scientific, literary, religious, and so forth; great systems of thought or administration; great public policies in national affairs; great public movements dominated by a common idea or purpose; the general influence of the press, the platform, the pulpit; the more limited influence of special professions or avocations on individual character; and countless similar agencies which, more or less perceptibly, mould and guide in a purely general way the development of social and individual life. A few examples will show what we mean.

The character of a national government, though itself the product of the general character of the people, powerfully reacts upon the latter, and gives a monarchical, aristocratic, or republican coloring to public opinion and sentiment; whence in part the vast difference in the general spirit of different countries. The system of Universal Expositions, World's Fairs, State and County Fairs, and so forth, has given a great stimulus to agriculture and the mechanic arts, and exerted no little educational influence in this direction. The existence of a large standing army in any country not only creates a certain unmistakable "army spirit" in officers and soldiers, but powerfully affects the entire people as well. A great university not only educates its own students, but gives a clearly marked character to the "university town." The French Institute, the British Association, and similar institutions, exert an incalculable influence in fostering the love of knowledge in myriad minds and in educating the world at large to a becoming respect for science. The power of Christian theology in directing social development needs no illustration; but the influence of Aristotle over the general intellectual life of the middle ages, and of John Stuart Mill over the general intellectual life of modern England, may be cited as illustrating the educational potency of philosophic thought. The adoption of a fixed national policy, like that of emancipation in our late war, results in the education of vast multitudes of people into new convictions. A reformatory movement guided by wisdom and moral enthusiasm is of itself a liberal education to those who give themselves up to it, and sends ripples of new life to the farthest confines of society. As Col. Higginson pointedly remarks in his Atlantic Essays: "Seeing the educational value to this generation of the reforms for which it has contended, and especially of the anti-slavery enterprise, one must feel an impulse of pity for our successors, who seem likely to have no convictions for which they can honestly be mobbed." Let us be encouraged, however, on this latter point; the convictions are here—and the mobs may yet be here, too.

These few illustrations will show what importance should be attached to general educational influences, acting chiefly not upon the individual as such directly, but mightily affecting his development by affecting the general state of society itself. No individual can be truly educated, if these subtle and perhaps unsuspected influences are greatly hostile to true education. The ignorance and selfishness of the past have perpetuated themselves in the unfavorable social conditions of to-day, the chronic evils of all kinds which it is the special object of reform to correct. In considering the character of the education which Free Religion aims at, as indicated by the four great ideas which it seeks to make the four supporting pillars, as it were, of the social fabric, it would be woefully superficial to dwell only upon the direct relation of each individual to the other individuals immediately surrounding him,—parents, or instructors, for instance, or even the entire circle of relatives, friends, and casual acquaintances. Even more important than the education derived directly from these is the education derived from the countless undefinable but most potent influences which we have classed together as educational in a general sense. They constitute the spiritual climate,—the universal environment which exerts so vast a power over the nature and development of the individual.

Retrospectively viewed, the totality of conditions directly affecting the individual's ancestors, and indirectly affecting the individual himself by the great law of inheritance, should be included under the same category. But it is impossible to re-make the past; it is impossible to re-make the present, which has grown out of the past; and it is consequently the most unsubstantial of visions to dream of "regeneration" or the "second birth." Once born, we are what we are; there is no repetition of the event, and the future must follow from men and women as they exist. The only way to secure to posterity the inestimable privilege of being "born well" is rightly to educate to-day the parents of posterity. And the nature of the power exerted over them by the universal social environment is of the very first importance.

Free Religion, therefore, not only seeks to perfect the educational system, so-called,—including the schools, seminaries, academies, colleges, and so forth,—but it also seeks to purify, reform, and re-create, as it were, the defective conditions of social life, to the end that the new-born individual may be surrounded by general educational influences of a purer and higher type. Thus alone can the race be permanently elevated. If the four ideas of Free Religion above enunciated are truths, then they furnish a touchstone by which to test all existing institutions with reference to the character of the educational influence they exert. All such institutions as foster devotion to those great ideas are beneficial; all such as weaken it are injurious; all such as foster it and weaken it in different ways at the same time are partly beneficial and partly injurious.

This is the reason why, of all existing institutions which are powerfully rooted in modern society, Free Religion must look upon the Christian Church, notwithstanding its partial good influence in some respects, as the most formidable and stubborn obstacle of social reform. It extinguishes the free self-government of the individual in bondage to a Pope, a Church, a Bible, a Christ; it substitutes for the universal fellowship of humanity the narrow membership of the Church; it diverts the supreme self-devotion of the individual from the general welfare of the race to the person of the Christ; it anathematizes conformity to Nature as rebellion against God, and demands the extinction of all that is merely natural as the sole condition of his favor. Thus at every point Christianity flatly denies the great affirmations of Free Religion, and to the extent of its power over men's minds chokes up the very fountain-head of all social reform. While Free Religion calls upon universal society to take up the great task of reforming its own evils by a strictly natural change of its own conditions, Christianity bids them to despise all such methods as irreligious, and to place no confidence in any reform not based on the supernatural regeneration of mankind. It will take a long time, perhaps, before the world distinctly recognizes the chief block to its own progress; but the discovery will most certainly be made, and it will be the doom of Christianity.

We said that the great affirmations of Free Religion are the fountain-head of all social reform. A few words on this point, and we will conclude this long series of articles, with the hope that they have aroused some useful thought. We venture to lay down two propositions:—

1. That the true origin of every genuine reformatory movement must be sought in conscious or unconscious faith in the four great ideas of Free Religion.

2. That the true explanation of every mistake made by reformers must be sought in their ignorance or disregard of these same ideas.

A single instance must now suffice, though the list of reforms is nothing but a list of instances.

Whence sprang the Temperance reform? Why object at all to the voluntary self-imbrutement of the drunkard? Scrutinize closely the reason of the protest made against intemperance, and it is substantially this: that drunkenness is a violation of the law that every individual should govern himself by reason and conscience rather than by his appetites and passions. Until a sense of the outraged dignity of human nature was awakened, no protest against intemperance was ever heard; and it is heard now only in those quarters where human nature is revered as worthy of better things than to be turned into the gutter, like the hogs.

But what has been the chief blunder of Temperance reformers? It has been a disregard of the very same law in behalf of which the Temperance protest is made; namely, a resort to legislative prohibition of the liquor traffic. The protest lies intrinsically against the drunkard's disregard of the natural supremacy of reason and conscience, his voluntary enthronement of an animal appetite in their place, as the cause of countless practical miseries and wrongs. But the reformers have been guilty of the very same disregard; they have not been content to aim at restoring the natural sovereignty of reason and conscience in every individual by means of education, but have endeavored to stamp out the evils of intemperance under the heel of prohibitory legislation. In this effort they have treated society as a child in whom reason and conscience exist only in embryo, and who must therefore be governed by the will of others; whereas society is composed of adults as well as children, and cannot be governed in any such manner. The true question of reform is—how shall we induce all men at all times freely to obey reason and conscience instead of appetite? The answer to this question is the only possible solution of the problem of intemperance; and while the reformers too often trust to a quick cure by statute, Free Religion trusts only to a gradual cure by education, in the large sense already explained.

In the same manner Free Religion approaches all the great social evils which need to be reformed. Its method is unpretentious, but thorough; and, however distasteful to the ardent temperaments which demand the instant extinction of these inveterate evils, it is based on the knowledge of human nature and the laws of social science. We claim that Free Religion is itself the very spirit of all reform; that all wise reforms have grown out of its ideas, whether comprehended or not; that all professed reforms must be tested by these ideas; that no great reformatory success can ever be achieved until all special reforms are organized as part of a general system of reform based on these ideas; and that whatever most hinders the complete recognition of these ideas as the only secret of victory in battling with social evils is the worst foe to reform, and needs itself to be reformed out of existence. Therefore we believe that Christianity, notwithstanding its incidental benefits to society (without which, of course, it could not continue to be supported, but which, nevertheless, blind the eyes of society to its predominant influence), must give place to Free Religion, before the world shall see its grand dream realized of a vast Commonwealth of Man, free, united, just, prosperous, and happy.

One of the Japanese residents of Washington, D. C., recently described himself as "an inquiring Pagan, educated scientifically, and demanding toleration." If the A. B. C. F. M. cannot convert a score or so of Japanese "inquiring Pagans" in America, where they have such enormous advantages to avail themselves of, they have a slender prospect of converting the many millions in Japan itself. Possibly, however, it is close contact with the A. B. C. F. M. which is the best prophylactic against conversion.

Dr. E. B. M. Browne, of Evanville, Indiana, writes to us that he is soon to publish a book entitled "The Encyclopedia of Talmudic Beauties." It will be an anthology of adages, anecdotes, aphorisms, fables, legends, myths, parables, and so forth, of the ancient Hebrews. Dr. Browne is reputed to be a rabbi of much learning; and Dr. Wise, of Cincinnati, highly commends the as yet unpublished manuscript.

Mr. Conway writes us that he intends soon to publish a new volume of "ethnical scriptures," probably with the title—"The Sacred Anthology." There will be five-shilling and half-crown editions. Large numbers of persons have already subscribed for it. Mr. Conway's taste is admirable, and the collection will beyond all doubt be an invaluable one.

CRITICISMS.

A cursory glance at the papers since the recent conventions of the Free Religious Association encourages the belief that the public appreciation of its work is considerably more favorable than it has been. The tone of the religious press in general has not reached us. If the Liberal Christian be a fair sample of it, the change of view is very noticeable: a more courteous and cordial mention of the Association could not be made than appeared in the columns of that paper on the week subsequent to the meetings in Brooklyn. It is conceded that the Association has an important work to do, and intimates that it is doing it with something like ability and in a reasonably good spirit. What it says of the performance of the individual men who conduct the enterprise is even more than kind.

The comment of the secular papers, though brief, has been generally respectful. The press of Philadelphia, where the idea of the Association was quite new, was cautious, but serious. The Brooklyn papers blundered as they all do, and made themselves foolish by attempts at innocent pleasantry, but said nothing insulting or offensive. The New York World gave careful report of the speeches, accompanied by a contemptuous editorial which declared that the Association was doing nothing and tending nowhere, and was distinguished mainly by an extraordinary development of the gift of tongues. The editorial was not written in the best temper, and was marred by two or three unaccountable mistakes in fact. Still, to have an editorial at all was something, from a critic so superlatively fastidious as the World, and the report of the convention was fair and grave beyond any previous report in that paper, the tendency of which to caricature and persiflage seems to make seriousness and justice on any theme impossible.

The Golden Age, a paper both secular and religious, spoke rather more than cordially of the Association and its objects, commended its temper, lauded its officers, applauded its words, mingling a judicious sprinkling of criticism with its comments, in order that the approbation might not seem unqualified or unthinking. The warm-hearted editor here, too, complimented us by an editorial which we perused with interest, but which, with the usual ingratitude of human nature, we feel disposed to criticize a little.

Mr. Clarke (we presume it to have been he) suggests that the Association misplaces its emphasis, and so misses its aim. It lays its stress on liberty, when it should lay its stress on religion. Men have liberty enough he thinks, but do not care to use it,—feel no call or motive to use it. They are slaves of their creeds because no better are presented. To tell them to rise and shake off their dogmatical and ecclesiastical fetters is useless, unless they be inspired with some fine enthusiasm for a new faith that will make emancipation natural and necessary; and such a faith they do not discover. Let the Free Religious Association proclaim such a faith, and the shackles will fall off immediately. Liberty is but a condition; faith is a principle; a change of conditions will not as matter of course affect a principle, but a change of principle will as matter of course affect conditions.

All which sounds plausible; but, we are persuaded, it is all unsound. That people want a new religion should not be too hastily affirmed. There is a good deal of very excellent religion in the world, eloquently taught, widely published, entertained by intelligent people, recommended by admirable lives. The best teachers among the Unitarians, Universalists, and other liberal sects, have for many years promulgated ideas of religion quite worthy of wise men's acceptance. The religious writings of mankind, the bibles, scriptures, books of ethics and philosophy—Greek, Roman, Asiatic, Indian—contain principles of religion that ought to satisfy and do satisfy the most liberal champions of free religion. There is plenty of the very best kind of religion among Protestants and Romanists. In fact there is not much to be added to the finest expressions of the religious sentiments that are now tolerably familiar to cultivated men and women. If these were diffused among the multitudes, interpreted, commended, and inculcated with the same zeal that is devoted to the dissemination of sectarian dogmas; if the best books of religion were widely distributed and read by all people without hesitancy or prejudice—the Free Religious Association would have no justification for its existence, and would never have been called into being. It was organized for the sole purpose of making it possible for people to become naturally acquainted with the best religious ideas, and to grow familiar with the finest expressions of the religious sentiment in any and in all literature. That they cannot do this now is owing simply and solely to the absence of mental freedom; and this is to be accounted for by the efforts of the sectarian leaders, who will not permit their followers to read any but their own books.

It is a clear and familiar fact that no sectarian is encouraged to make himself acquainted with any ideas outside of the pale of his denomination. How many Protestants are acquainted with the best literature of Romanism? How many "Evangelicals" know the writings of Channing, Dewey, or Ware? How many old-school Unitarians study appreciatively the writings of Theodore Parker, or can give an intelligible account of the opinions of the rationalists? Is it common for Christians to read the Bhagavad-gita, or for Jews to feed on the thoughts of Marcus Aurelius or Epictetus? There is water enough, but of dykes there are too many. The pastures are numerous, and broad, and ripe with grain; but the high stone walls forbid communication. Free trade in religion is the great need,—the removal of restrictions, the raising of embargoes, the suppression of custom-houses; and this the sectarians will not allow or so much as think of. They hug their privileges; they cling to their monopolies of power and influence; they are jealous of any sharing their wealth; their aim in existence is to preserve their organization and advance their prestige.

The Free Religious Association, therefore, does not lay the emphasis on the wrong word when it lays it on liberty; it places it precisely where it belongs. The need of the hour is liberty. Grant that, and a new religion, because an unsectarian religion, will come,—a religion of charity which must in the nature of things become sooner or later a religion of reason. O. B. F.

LOCAL RADICAL ORGANIZATION.

In connection with the recent Convention of the Free Religious Association in Philadelphia, some very interesting facts were brought to light pertaining to the local organization of the radical and progressive elements in religion. Before any public announcement had been made of the proposed Convention, the Secretary of the Association received a letter from a gentleman residing in a small town in the northern part of Pennsylvania, stating that he was in correspondence with all the prominent Radicals in the State whose names were known to him with reference to holding a "Radical State Convention," which should "bear the same relation to the State that the Free Religious Association bears to the country;" and asking for any information the Secretary might have with regard to persons who would probably be willing to co-operate in such a Convention, and the best place for holding it. The writer of the letter was Mr. J. S. Thomson, educated as a Scotch Presbyterian, recently a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church in New Milford, Pennsylvania, and now a preacher to a free and independent society in the same place. Two or three letters had been previously received from him briefly asking for Reports and other publications of the F. R. Association; but not until this letter about the Convention did he say anything of his theological history and position. Nor did he at this time know anything of the plan entertained by the Executive Committee of F. R. Association to hold a Convention at Philadelphia. It was a spontaneous movement on the part of himself and a few other like-minded persons in different parts of the State, towards a better acquaintance and co-operation among themselves. In reply to Mr. Thomson's letter, the proposed Philadelphia Convention was mentioned, and the suggestion made that perhaps these movers for a State convention might sugsuccessfully accomplish their present purpose through the Philadelphia meeting. This suggestion was most cordially accepted and acted upon.

Accordingly, as stated last week, the afternoon at the Philadelphia Convention was set apart for a conference of those who were in any way interested in a liberal local organization. The meeting was much larger than had been anticipated, and developed an unexpected interest in the subject that had called it together. It was probably too large wholly to meet the views of those who had first moved for some kind of State organization. Yet it was an excellent preliminary meeting for exhibiting the interest, direct and indirect, in the question, and also for acquainting them with the field to be occupied; if it showed also some of the obstacles to be contended against, it was none the less valuable on this account. There were present at this meeting not only those who wanted some co-operative State movement, but those who were more especially interested in the organization of a radical religious society in Philadelphia, as also those who thought that present organizations were sufficient for all needs. The Middle States Unitarian Conference was named as being very liberal and inclusive; but more pronounced radicals evidently did not regard that organization as answering the purpose.

But, besides this difference of view in respect to the kind of organization most required, there was manifest that ineradicable difference of temperament which always shows itself in a gathering of radicals in religion, and which is perhaps at present the greatest obstacle in the way of their working together for a religious purpose in any but the most general way. The whole meeting may be said to have held substantially the same rational, free, and unsectarian views concerning religion; yet there was in it the logical and combative temperament which will not be satisfied with any Sunday assembly in which free debate does not have a prominent place—the religious temperament which will be equally unsatisfied with a regular Sunday service which does not prominently recognize the devotional element, and the æsthetic temperament which, in spite of rationalistic views, has a liking for the artistic in religion and holds tenderly and reverently for this reason to many sacred traditions and institutions. All these different temperaments and mental moods can come together harmoniously and to mutual profit in such a general Convention as is held by the Free Religious Association, or as might be held under the auspices of a similar State organization; but it is only under rare circumstances that they can be effectively combined in a local organization to meet every week for general religious and moral purposes. The time does not seem to have come for this, to any great extent as yet. They can, however, all be brought together in special local organization for some specific purpose,—as they are, in the Radical Clubs, for conversation and free discussion, and as they sometimes are, in a local society, for some humane or educational object, and as they might be in a counter-movement against the organized attempt to engraft the "Christian amendment" clause upon the United States Constitution. But much beyond this, it is doubtful if at present all the radical and liberal elements in religious thought can naturally fall into local organization. They can come together in general occasional conventions, where subjects of common interest are considered and every phase and mood of earnest sentiment gets appropriate representation; and in this way they will help each other to a better understanding of each other's needs and aspirations, and so gradually, perhaps, learn the common ground on which they can stand together in all local organization, or at least acquire more of fraternal respect and fellowship for each other at their separate posts. And this conference at Philadelphia tended to this result certainly, even though it should have no other conclusion.

It should be added that, at this meeting, officers of the Free Religious Association who were present distinctly stated that it was not the policy or purpose of the Association itself to attempt to organize any local societies; that it would be contrary to the spirit of its constitution for it to do so, or to encourage any but friendly and informal relations of co-operation for the same objects between such societies and itself; that all local movements should spring out of local needs, and conform to local emergencies, and not necessarily take pattern after the national organization except in the element of freedom; that in this way, while there would be no feeling of local dependence or subordination, and nothing that should have the appearance of a sectarian movement, there yet would be real co-operation and fellowship among those laboring for the same ends.

W. J. P.

THE POLYTECHNIC SCHOOL.

In the report of the educational department of the Great Industrial Exhibition at Paris, I find the following pleasing anecdote which I translate for INDEX readers. The writer is speaking of the "Association Polytechnique." He says:—

"At the moment when this Association was established, a brilliant halo surrounded the pupils of the Polytechnic School,—these Generals of twenty years who had just taken such a glorious part in the triumph of progress. After having conducted the workmen to the combat, some among them had the happy thought of occupying and entertaining the leisure hours of those who had been wounded and were convalescent, by giving them instruction in science."

This idea was carried out in an infirmary at St. Cloud, and resulted in a permanent association which gave gratuitous instruction to eight hundred workmen in useful branches of science.

E. D. C.

EDITORIAL BOOK NOTICE.

TOWN GEOLOGY. By the Rev. Charles Kingsley, Canon of Chester. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1872. (Toledo: T. J. Brown.) This little book contains the substance of a course of familiar lectures on geology, given to the young men of Chester, by one of the best known of modern English writers. He takes the texts of his six papers from the "Bolt of the Field," the "Pebbles on the Street," the "Stones in the Wall," the "Coal in the Fire," the "Lime in the Mortar," and the "Slates on the Roof;" and it is interesting to see how instructive these commonplace of common objects become, when discoursed about by one who can throw upon them the light of extensive knowledge. Mr. Kingsley is much more than a novelist, though until lately chiefly known by his novels; and it is evident that he simply states the fact when he says, that he has long been an enthusiastic student of geology, his favorite science. While, however, the desultory method he adopts in imparting information may be the one best suited to a popular and unscientific audience, it is not the one best suited to the thoughtful reader, who is very apt to tire of being written down to, as if unable to profit by a more systematic style of instruction. The main purpose is to lead the listener on by very gradual steps from what he knows to what he does not know, carrying him along through the same cautious inductions by which the original investigators finally attained their results; but this method, although excellent in some respects, is little fitted to give a clear and connected view of the results themselves. Still, a more methodical treatment is in danger of wearying minds which are little accustomed to take comprehensive views of subjects; and we would by no means quarrel with Mr. Kingsley, who does so well what he has undertaken, for not undertaking something quite different. Whoever desires to study geology in a more scientific manner can easily do so by taking up Sir Charles Lyell's "Principles of Geology" and "Student's Elements of Geology;" and it would be difficult to find a treatise on the subject less likely than this to repel the beginner by a tough diet of technicalities. The "Preface," which is a very sincere attempt to vindicate science against foolish objections, and to reconcile it in some degree with Christian theology, is the least successful part of the book in our opinion. The Canon quotes a little Scripture in a very left-handed sort of way, in order to get over the evident fact that Christian theology has always represented the earth as under a "curse" (pages 11-14); but the radical reader will pass over this quite professional digression with a smile. We notice, by the way, that Mr. Kingsley (page 227) declares that "we do not know" the cause why the planes of cleavage in the slate are so seldom coincident with the planes of bedding or stratification. The explanation, however, is very clearly given by Prof. Tyndall in the little work noticed last week, entitled Forms of Water (pages 138-139). He states that the case is "exactly similar to that of glacier lamination;" shows that the slate has "suffered enormous pressure at right angles to the planes of cleavage, exactly as the glacier has demonstrably suffered great pressure at right angles to its planes of lamination;" and illustrates the necessary effect of such pressure by squeezing a ball of wax between two glass plates, in which case it results that "no slate rock ever exhibited so fine a cleavage." Nay, more; by powdering the slate itself, adding water, and squeezing it in precisely the same manner, the cleavage is restored. It is plain, therefore, that the cleavage planes of the slate are simply the result of the enormous pressure applied to the primitive mud by the vast weight of the superincumbent rocks. Mr. Kingsley, it is true, refers in a single sentence to the theory of Mr. Daniel Sharpe, that the cleavage results from pressure (page 229); but he evidently fails to perceive that this theory is an adequate explanation of the phenomenon in question.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

RADICAL CHRISTIAN CREED.

BY REV. EDWARD C. TOWNE.

It seems to me unfortunate to say "creedlessness our creed," when we do not properly mean it, any more than we mean to say "thoughtlessness our thought." We have beliefs as much as we have thoughts, and the definite sum of our beliefs is our creed. There is no occasion to give up the word creed to a solely bad use. Webster defines it: "A definite summary of what is believed; a brief exposition of important points, as in religion, science, politics, &c." There is more excuse for seeing a bad sense only in the word dogma, of which Webster says: "Dogma has in our language acquired, to some extent, a repulsive sense, from its carrying with it the idea of authority or undue assumption." It is very likely to be understood that a dogma purports to peremptorily demand the submission of reason, whether one can see its truth or not. A creed may be very dogmatic, and so very reprehensible. Or it may be peremptory, on the evident authority of truth and goodness, as in our opinion of murder, adultery, and dogmatic Orthodoxy; in which case it is perhaps not reprehensible. But in general one's creed, or body of beliefs, may be held in a spirit the reverse of dogmatic, merely as our creed, with no intent to impose it upon others. In this sense every studious and thoughtful person will have a creed, and scholarly thinkers ought to be able to definitely state their creed. I will state mine as nearly as I can put it into brief definitions. But I state it as more than mine; as the summary of beliefs which it seems to me will result from that way of thinking which I call Radical Christian. And to make connection, by contrast at least, with the past, I show what dogma of Orthodoxy I reject, and what belief I put in its place. By belief I mean neither knowledge nor infallible opinion, but only a very strong conviction, the result of study and thought. I know of no ground, either in history or in the human mind, either in any Bible or teacher, or in any learning and insight, for being sure that we have correctly thought and studied and believed and are free from error. The corner stone of wise divination, of sound divinity, is sincere humility bearing up through thought. But to come to my statement.

Radical Christian faith seems to me to offer, instead of the Orthodox dogmas, the following radical and rational beliefs:—

1. Instead of the dogma of One Personal God divided into three persons, BELIEF in God conceived under three aspects,—as Infinite Father or Providence, Infinite Reason or Intelligence, and Infinite Spirit or Life. Infinite Force, Law, Order, Soul, &c., are other conceptions of the Supreme Being, whose existence passes all understanding. Dogmatic anxiety to catch God under the word "Personal" is a survival of the savage conception of Deity as a Ghost Soul. God is infinitely more than personal.

2. Instead of the dogma of God's consuming wrath against sinners, BELIEF in God's reformatory discipline, here and hereafter, of all souls,—a discipline in which the severities of justice are curative and not damnable.

3. Instead of the dogma of the Incarnation of the Divine Nature, or of one of three Divine Persons, in Jesus, BELIEF that God is present, by his providence and inspiration, in all men, in proportion as they yield to divine discipline, and that he was present in Jesus only in this way, making Jesus no more than a human prophet of divine truth,—and not a God-man at all.

4. Instead of the dogma that the Bible is the literal and infallible Word of God, BELIEF that all evidently pure and sacred truth, in whatever books, is from God, and that the Bible is from God only so far as it contains evidently pure and sacred truth,—and so is not a divine book at all.

5. Instead of the dogma of an exclusive Christian Church, in which communion unites believers only, BELIEF that human society is a divine brotherhood; that we ought especially to get hold of, and keep hold of, those whose moral danger is greatest; and that filial confidence in God's goodness to all souls ought to bind us to all souls in religious good will,—our church including all who can be persuaded to come and share its advantages.

6. Instead of the dogma that human nature is totally and hopelessly depraved, BELIEF that human nature, even at the lowest, is so under the preservative and curative power of divine providence and divine inspiration as to have always an inward better self, the growth of which evil can keep back, but cannot forever prevent, and in the life and growth of which man is always and forever the child of God,—sure to return to his Father at last.

7. Instead of the dogma that the death of Jesus made an atonement to God for man's sin,

BELIEF that God for his own name's sake restores or will restore all souls by wise and loving and perfect discipline, and does not need that any sacrifice be made to him other than that which our hearts offer when we yield to his discipline.

8. Instead of the dogma of a Devil and Hell, a place and a prince of moral evil without cure or control, BELIEF that God's infinite and perfect moral power over all creatures, to make them good and happy, excludes beyond all doubt the possibility of a devil or a hell.

9. Instead of the dogma that Christianity is a miraculous revelation, historically handed down from one source, BELIEF that Christianity is the natural fruit of universal providence and inspiration, springing up wherever men have learned to trust God as children and to love one another as brothers.

10. Instead of the dogma that Christian faith sets out from evidences that the Bible as a whole is a divine revelation, BELIEF that it starts rather from the evidently pure and sacred truth concerning God as a Father, and God's providence and inspiration, which we find in a few indisputable passages,—such as Jesus's doctrine of divine love and lesson of prayer, in the Sermon on the Mount,—and that whatever does not agree with this evidently pure and sacred truth is to be rejected; as Jesus rejected some words of Peter with a "Get thee behind me, satan," because the apostle "savored not of the things of God." It is GOD first and last and all the time that we are to believe in.

11. Instead of the dogma that man was made by free will able to defy divine control, BELIEF that the Maker of man was not a fool that he should let his own creature get away from his control, and is not an imbecile that he cannot prevail to train his offspring according to his will, and sway the ends of the earth, and of the creature universe, to his perfect purpose of final holiness and happiness in all.

12. Instead of the dogma that Jesus was absolute perfection in his humanity, his teaching and his life, BELIEF, upon the plain evidence of the record, that he was a very simple young man, with a gift of healing, such as Spiritualism now makes familiar, and a gift of loving trust and devotion, such as Hebrew teaching would awaken in a tender and zealous heart, and an enthusiasm for Messiahship, suggested by popular Jewish ideas and by the idea that the gift of healing was "the finger of God," in which he got plainly off the track of providence and inspiration, provoked a violent end, and had to surrender his will and wish, and go hence by a bloody death, to appear only to the visions, the ecstasies, the legendary dreams of his mostly ignorant disciples, and be by their carnal error made a divine personage between man and God.

In the above points I have intended especially to cross the claims made for Orthodox points of dogma as these are now urged. In my next I will offer some further remarks.

THE THEOLOGY OF SPIRITUALISM.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:—

I notice in a recent copy of THE INDEX the following remarks over the initials H. W. N.: "I see no other way open for a man who believes matter is not eternal but to accept the God of the Bible, if not wholly, at least substantially;" and again: "There is no doubt that the great and real question now to be solved by science is—'Is there a God?' This finally answered, we can then proceed in our investigation of things which are now only guessed at or assumed; but until this doubt is settled, we must pause."

I will offer my views of this subject with the hope that they may at least partially satisfy the doubtful, and awaken the thoughts and open the eyes of immaterialists.

Matter and force are the great elemental conditions of the universe, self-existent and co-eternal. One kind of matter is ponderable, and the other imponderable.

In other words, there exists gross matter and ethereal or electrical matter.

The two, however, may have the same essence and differ only in the aggregation of the atoms of matter; or, in other words, what we call gross matter may be but a segregation or kind of crystallization of ethereal matter in definite masses. The nebular theory rests upon this latter hypothesis. Be this as it may, however, we know that all matter is in motion, and motion is the equivalent of force. We know that matter exists through the evidence of our senses, and that nothing can come from nothing. The two latter propositions are self-evident and admit of no proof. Since, then, matter now exists, it is something; and, as nothing added to nothing can produce nothing, matter in some form or other has necessarily existed from all eternity. Matter, therefore, never was created; it is necessarily self-existent; and, since it was never created, it required no creator to bring it into existence. Therefore, in the theological sense, there can be no creator. Moreover, since matter now exists and could never come from nothing, it is equally clear that it can never become nothing, or be annihilated; it must, therefore, necessarily exist to all eternity in the future in elemental form or otherwise.

We also know through our senses that force exists. We see the light and feel heat and electricity; and, since they are palpably evident to our senses, they are a necessary existence of imponderable matter. Since force is a peculiar form of elemental existence, it must, in what form soever it manifests itself, be something; and, since something can never by any possibility come from nothing, force must necessarily likewise be eternal.

Matter and force, then, are self-existent and co-eternal; but time, space, matter, and force constitute all that is. Hence, if there exists anything in the universe which cannot become known through our senses or consciousness, it exists not for man to know anything about it; for these are the only means given us by Nature through which we can gain a knowledge of anything that exists. Hence the theological conception of God is a chimera, since it is immaterial, a great something of which we can gain no knowledge through our senses. But although the theological God is a chimera, it by no means follows that there is no God, Almighty Power or Force, superior to all else in Nature.

"All are but parts of one stupendous whole, Whose body Nature is, and God the soul."

Since all matter is in motion and motion is the equivalent of force, the force that moves all matter must necessarily be omnipotent; and, being omnipotent, it must necessarily be omnipresent, in order to move all matter.

Thus we have found at least three of the attributes usually ascribed to the Deity, resulting necessarily from matter and force: an eternal, omnipotent, and omnipresent existence.

But there is still another force existing in Nature of which we are conscious; namely, the mind, life, or knowing force of man and other animals. This is the most imponderable of all forces known to man. Yet we know that it exists; and, since it exists, it is likewise an element of Nature and necessarily eternal.

All Nature being eternal, and mind forming an elemental part or manifestation of Nature in man, the highest attribute known to us, we naturally conclude that the knowing principle of the universe, or omniscience, is the highest attribute of God or all, and that all is God.

Thus we determine the attributes of Nature or God: the Eternal, Omnipotent, Omnipresent, Omniscient Whole. I, then, am in God, and God is in me. I am, as it were, an element of the Whole—in God and of God; and to the extent of the magnitude of the life, mind, soul, or spirit-force that is in me, am I endowed with the attributes of God. Under this demonstration of things, future existence is no longer a matter of hope, as it was with Paul. Eternal existence becomes a matter of certainty. And, if God is in heaven, and heaven is a state of beatitude, it necessarily follows, since God is omnipresent, that heaven is here, anywhere, everywhere. If there is a hell, it is necessarily in heaven; and since God is everywhere, he must necessarily be in hell. But it is supposed that hell is a place or state of torment, which involves a contradiction; and therefore one or the other of these states of future existence is impossible. Either future existence is a state of eternal torment, or it is a state of eternal beatitude.

Happily, however, we are not left to mere conjecture in this matter. Facts, stubborn facts, have bridged the gulf between the present and the future state. The minds, the souls, the spirits of the departed are daily, nightly, hourly revealing to us the beatitude of heaven, the blissful state of all.

Spiritualism has opened the gateway to heaven's portals, and revealed the existence of the incomprehensible God of the universe, the Whole.

J. E. WALLACE.

HOW TO SPEND A HOLIDAY.

NEW YORK, Nov. 29, 1872.

ED. INDEX:—

Allow me to give my yesterday's experience canvassing the city of Brooklyn for THE INDEX, and suggest a little work for subscribers for the next holidays.

At 8½ o'clock, A. M., I left my boarding-house for Brooklyn. I intended to go and hear Mr. Beecher preach, then return to Thanksgiving dinner. But I got interested hunting for heretics in the city of churches, and concluded to dispense with "Divine Service," as possibly in the meantime I might get a subscriber, which I succeeded in doing. I called on a radical lady; and, as I found her absent at church but expected to return soon, I concluded to wait. While doing so, I interested myself reading the sermon in last week's INDEX entitled, "The Pearl of Great Price," which it proved to be to me, and which I hope has been read by every subscriber. This I accepted as my Thanksgiving sermon. Few better were preached that day.

After leaving the place, I concluded, as another subscriber would be more valuable than the turkey dinner, not to spend time going after it, but to continue canvassing until night, which I did.

This was the manner in which I kept Thanksgiving; and the names I obtained I send in this letter. I found it a very pleasant way to keep a holiday.

Now allow me to make a suggestion to THE INDEX subscribers:—

That as we have no Christ and no Bible to worship, and as THE INDEX is to be enlarged soon, we devote our time on next Christmas day to soliciting subscribers in our respective neighborhoods. I can assure you from experience that the gratification of obtaining one subscriber is much greater than can be obtained from a dozen turkey dinners.

Please try this experiment.

H. L. G.

A LETTER FROM MR. BUTTS.

CHICAGO, Nov. 22, 1872.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I find some of our friends much mistake my connection with the paper and give some trouble by sending cheques, drafts, and so forth, to my order. Please inform them that I have acted as general agent only in the sense that I am not a local agent. I have given hints, advice, and information to local agents when I could conveniently, and I have employed such other travelling agents as could be induced by their love of the cause, and such commission as THE INDEX has been able to pay those who work in its behalf, to give a part or all of their time to this cause. These and some other light services I have been able to render the paper in the intervals of other and entirely different business. I should like to say to all who believe it desirable to encourage THE INDEX, that the funds have not yet been provided to pay a "General Agent;" and until this is done, the prosperity of this cause must depend upon the individual and voluntary exertions of thousands of its friends in different parts of the country.

In the intervals of business, I have obtained clubs of over twenty subscribers in several towns where eight or nine months ago there was not one subscriber. There are hundreds of people in this country just as anxious to do this, and just as able every way, as myself, if they would only have the courage to think so.

The circulation of the paper might be trebled in one month by a little well sustained effort on the part of its enthusiastic friends, if they would only work more and talk less.

Can those who believe that Truth is wholesome, who love "Liberty and Light," and who would promote "Cultured Free Thought" among their fellow-men, do better with their spare time, their spare cash, or their influence among men, than to spread THE INDEX abroad among reading, intelligent people?

Meantime, lest our friends expect too much from me, and lest they put you to more inconvenience as above mentioned, it might be well to drop the word "General" in your notice of my connection with the paper. My heart will be with you all the same, and my hands will do their full share in this cause as heretofore.

Very truly, ASA K. BUTTS.

[In order to escape the practical inconveniences referred to by Mr. Butts, we make the desired change. But the noble spirit of his letter, so full of all that is high-minded and disinterested, forbids us to do so without publicly expressing our gratitude to him for his unwearied exertions in behalf of the paper and its cause. The value of his co-operation, direct and indirect, it would be difficult to state in too emphatic terms; and we thank him most sincerely for his assurance of continued sympathy and help in our work. Believing as we do that the cause of Free Religion is the cause of Man in its very highest aspect, we hope that all its friends will derive fresh incitement from him to toil with undiminished and ever-increasing devotion to its service.—ED.]

A revival preacher lately worked hard at Iron-ton, Ohio, to get up an interest, preaching day and night; but unsuccessfully. The last night the house was crowded, and the preacher outdid himself; but not a soul rose for prayers, and he sat down completely discouraged. Before the benediction was pronounced, however, a long-faced man got up, and said that the Elder had been working hard and labored faithfully with them, and as a token of their appreciation he moved the congregation give him three cheers. It was done with a heartiness which made the pews tremble.

A Welsh clergyman who preached from the text, "Love one another," gave a national turn to the subject by illustrating it with an anecdote of two goats who met on the middle of one plank bridge that crossed the little stream in their parish. "But did they fight and try to push each other in the water? Oh, no! but the one laid himself down while the other stepped over him. Here was friendship! Here was love! O, my brethren, let us all live like goats!"

220. S. BROWN,
Late Cashier Toledo
Savings Institution.

WM. A. FAUNCE,
Late with Henry S.
Stebbins.

BROWN & FAUNCE, BOOKSELLERS. STATIONERS. AND DEALERS IN

Wall and Window Papers,

(Successors to Henry S. Stebbins.)

115 SUMMIT STREET, TOLEDO, OHIO,

Keep constantly on hand a fine stock of standard and current literature, embracing books upon Science, Art, and Religion, and are in receipt of new books from publishers as issued. Books sent by mail post paid on receipt of publishers price, and promptly ordered when not in stock. Out-of-date and rare books furnished when procurable in this country or in England. Orders by mail solicited.

WANTED BOOK AGENTS FOR THE GREAT INDUSTRIES

OF THE UNITED STATES;

AN HISTORICAL SUMMARY OF THE ORIGIN, GROWTH,
AND PERFECTION OF THE CHIEF INDUS-TRIAL ARTS OF THIS COUNTRY.

1,300 PAGES AND 500 ENGRAVINGS.

Written by 20 Eminent Authors, including
JOHN B. GOUGH, LEON CASE, EDWARD HOWLAND,
JOS. B. LYMAN, REV. E. EDWIN HALL, HORACE
GREELEY, PHILIP RIPLEY,

ALBERT BRISBANE, F. B. PERKINS, Etc., Etc.

This work is a complete history of all branches of industry, processes of manufacture, etc., in all ages. It is a complete encyclopedia of arts and manufactures, and is the most entertaining and valuable work of information on subjects of general interest ever offered to the public. It is adapted to the wants of the Merchant, Manufacturer, Mechanic, Farmer, Student, and Inventor, and sells to both old and young of all classes. The book is sold by agents, who are making large sales in all parts of the country. It is offered at the low price of $3.50, and is the cheapest book ever sold by subscription. No family should be without a copy. We want Agents in every town of the United States, and no Agent can fail to do well with this book. Our terms are liberal. We give our agents the exclusive right of territory. One of our agents sold 183 copies in eight days; another sold 368 in two weeks. Our agent in Hartford sold 397 in one week. Specimens of the work sent to agents on receipt of stamp. For circulars and terms to agents address the publishers,

J. S. BURN & HYDE, Hartford, Conn.,
CHICAGO, ILL., or CINCINNATI, OHIO.

A copy of the above really valuable book will be mailed postpaid to any one who shall send $15.00, together with the names of FIVE NEW subscribers, to
"THE INDEX, DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO."

Friends of the Index!

Please send us immediately the name and address of every Radical Bookseller and Newsmen you may know of; also the address of every editor and paper likely to give aid and comfort to our enterprise; and oblige ASA E. BUTTS, Agent of THE INDEX.

Address

THE INDEX, DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE RADICAL.

A few odd volumes, bound in cloth, for sale at two dollars ($2) per vol. Sent post paid.

Address

SYDNEY H. MORSE,
25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

BOUND INDEX FOR 1871.—Complete files of THE INDEX for 1871, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $3.50 and 75 cents postage, or sent by express if the postage is not prepaid by the purchaser. Only a limited number can be furnished.

THE EXAMINER.—A limited number of Nos. 1, 2, 4, and 5 will be sent postpaid—the four numbers for 50 cents. Nos. 1, 2, and 5 for 40 cents. Nos. 1 and 2 for 30 cents. No. 1 for 10 cents. What remain of full sets are reserved for binding. Zion's Herald says:—"The boldest heretic of today." The Independent says:—"The most pronounced radical in the land." The Chicago Post says:—"Equal to the utterances of Theodore Parker." Address THE EXAMINER, Winnetka, Ill., where the numbers for sale remain. [136-17]

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (Nos. 1 to 25) will be sent postpaid on receipt of sixty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word.") "New Edition." PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00. "Fear of the Living God," by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and prevents conception of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents. "Lecture on the Bible," by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00. "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1. "God in the Constitution," by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00. "The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00. "Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents. "The Present Heaven," by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests every body. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents. "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents. "The Impeachment of Christianity," by F. E. ABBOT. Third Ten thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies. "The God of Science," by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00. "Is Romanism Real Christianity?" Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00. "On the Vision of Heaven," by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and prevents conception of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution, by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests every body. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Third Ten thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

Address, THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

"THE CLERGY"

A SOURCE OF DANGER TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

Every Liberal should read this book. Price $1.75, postage free. Send for a copy. Address W. F. Jamieson, 129 & 141 Monroe St., Chicago, Ill. Agents wanted in every city, town, and village in the American Union.

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy,

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY IN ST. LOUIS, MO.

It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of Speculative Philosophy in all its departments.

Terms of Subscription.

Two dollars per volume; single number, 50 cents. Vols. I and II, bound in one volume in muslin, will be sent post-paid by mail for $5.00. Vol. III, Vol. IV, and Vol. V, in muslin, $5.00 each.

All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor,

WM. T. HARRIS,

110-16100w.

Box 2396, St. Louis, Mo.

Back Numbers of the Index!

FOR 1870 AND 1871.

IT is no longer possible to furnish a complete file of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address at

Twenty-five Cents a Dozen!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

Address

THE INDEX,
Toledo, Ohio.

Guns for the People.

Breech-Loading Double Guns, $40 to $200. Double-Barrel Shot Guns, $25 to $150. Single Guns, $25 to $20. Breech-loading and Repeating Rifles, $30 to $100. Revolvers, $25 to $200. Pistols, 75c. to $5. Gun material, fixtures and ammunition of every kind very cheap. SEND STAMP for Large Illustrated and Descriptive Price-List to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Samuel Johnson's Work On India.

Sent on receipt of price, $5.00.

Address

S. H. MORSE,

25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.
Send to same address for Catalogue of other scientific and religious works.

FOR ENGLISH AND AMERICAN BOOKS
of all kinds, send to J. F. RUGGLES, Bronson, Mich.
[18100w1]

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 142 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 25 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
EDWARD C. HALLLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
H. E. CHICHESTER, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. SEWMADE, of Weston, Mass.
Rev. MONSIEUR D. CONWAY, of London, England.

ASA E. BUTTS is Advertising Agent for the Index Association. All letters to him on business matters, relative to the paper, should be addressed—"THE INDEX, Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio."

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Send $5.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial.

Address

THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

New Tracts!

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition.

FIRST SERIES.....No. 1 to No. 25

SECOND SERIES.....No. 26 to No. 50

Either Series, 30 Cents; Both, 50 Cents.

Address

CHAS. E. WHIPPLE,

[25-38]

19 FINECLAY ST., BOSTON.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1871, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA;" by C. D. B. Mills, on the question, "DOES RELIGION REPRESENT A PERMANENT SETTLEMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A PERISHABLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY," together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucretia Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Saver, Alexander Loos, and others. Price, 35 cents; in packages of five or more, 25 cents each.

THE ANNUAL REPORTS for 1868, 1869, 1870, and 1871 (at 25 cents each), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), Rev. W. H. Channing's essay on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA" (20 cents), Col. T. W. Higginson's essay on "THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS" (30 cents), and an essay by W. J. Potter, on "REASON AND REVELATION" (10 cents)—all published through the Association—can also be obtained as above.

WM. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

HALL'S MAGIC SHADE FIXTURES!

An ingenious arrangement by which a Shade may be rolled down from the top, or raised from the bottom of the Window, or both, as may be desired; thus securing PERFECT VENTILATION, GOOD LIGHT, and at the same time COMPLETE PRIVACY in the room.

They are an admirable and cheap substitute for Inside Blinds. Are easily attached to Shades now in use. Are especially adapted for Office and Store Windows.

For sale by dealers in shades generally.

MANUFACTURED BY THE

CHICAGO CURTAIN FIXTURE COMPANY,

145 SOUTH CLINTON ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

[18717]

F. J. SCOTT,

J. H. STOPPLET

ARCHITECTS,

73 MADISON STREET (Near Boody House), TOLEDO.
[180-181]

DAVID C. FRANCIS,

DEALER IN

NEW AND OLD BOOKS,

17 Astor Place, and 140 8th St., New York.

Priced catalogues of books in stock, issued from time to time, will be forwarded free to any address.

55 to $20 per copy Agents wanted All classes in working power, of all kinds, young or old, men or women, at work for a few spare moments or all the time they can spare. Particulars free. Add to G. M. Stebbins & Co., Portland, Maine.

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, DECEMBER 21, 1872.

WHOLE No. 156.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLISWOOD ARNOT, Editor.
ABRAHAM WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS PROCTOR, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINS, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLGREN, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHERRY, BOY. CHARLES VOTSEY (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), Rev. MONROE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

Robust and Sentimental Goodness.

BY A. W. STEVENS.

We are yet to have in this country, I trust, an American Religion,—one which shall be somehow native to the soil, and yet cosmopolitan in its genius; one also which shall produce for us a type of sainthood far more natural than that of the mediæval and ancient times, and therefore vastly superior to that.

The saint of those times was too often a tame and sickly creature. He had no wholesome bravery; he ran away from the world, afraid of its temptations and trials, and hid himself in a cave or cell, and so fancied himself secure—as the ostrich, which hides its head in the sand, thinking because it sees no danger that therefore there is none. But our old saint was no more safe; for in running to the forest he did not run from himself: and self is the most dangerous enemy man has, unless he sublimates it with a true saintliness. The religious recluse carried with him his moral cowardice, and all those hungry human passions which refuse to be starved into subjection, and which slept in his breast only because they had no outward opportunity to waken them: slept there, not conquered and trained but drugged with solitude, fed on a thin diet of roots and berries. He looked attenuated and ghostly, did this old saint; but his ghostliness was not of the holy ghost; or, it was a very imperfect gesture of that august spirit. True holiness is wholeness, not halfness. It is putting into right relations and activity the whole man, not any part of him. Intellect, soul, sense,—all must be recognized, and given free course to be glorified. Can men ascend into the highest heaven while they are in ignorance, while their minds are all uncultivated and unfilled with the treasures of wisdom? Can they go there having sacrificed reason and common sense, and committed themselves to credulity and superstition? Can they even hope to carry their souls to that exaltation by spurning, reviling, macerating, and destroying their bodies, and treating their whole physical nature and the system of material things generally with contempt? We can hardly think so. And yet at the bottom of this old sainthood, and of much of the religion of past times, there was a signal lack of high faith in Man as he came right from the plastic hand of Nature—a belief that a large part of him was evil and must be crucified; that only as his super-abounding spirits were crushed out, his intellectual curiosity snubbed and suppressed, his high energy and force of character reduced and abated, was he able to arrive at a holy state pleasing to God and fit for heaven.

But here in America we are to learn to believe in Man as he was never believed in before. We are to know him better than he was ever known before, because we are to see his many-sidedness; because we are to see every variety and specimen of him that the four quarters of the earth can produce. And we are to make belief in Man, and all the sublime things his being hints at, the foundation of our new religion. And as the foundation is broad and universal, so the religion which we are to rear upon it is to be broad and universal. It is to be a spherical religion, not a hemi-spherical, not a tribal, not a provincial, not a national, but a human, a world-religion. It is to know nothing fragmentary and partial, but always is to seek to trace those full circles that Nature delights ever to describe in everything she creates. It is to draw on all climes and times, and yet is to grow up in this clime and time, and have its root as it were in this soil under our feet. And why not? This continent is the centre and heart of the globe, and draws from and communicates with every remote extremity of its huge body. It is no wild imagination to suppose that God reserved this spot of land, midway between the oceans, and between the modern civilization of Europe and the ancient civilization of Asia, as a fallow field wherein he would sow the choice seed brought from all the past, and grow a nobler harvest of ideas and of men than was ever grown before. I believe he will do this; and that we are to have here in America a better civilization, a better society, a better religion, than any other age or people ever realized,—which shall not be American merely, but which shall be human and cosmopolitan.

And out of this, as I have said, we are to have a type of sainthood which will vastly improve on that of the past. With us the hero and the saint shall combine in one. No longer will we suffer men to be divided into the great and the good; but the good shall be great, and the great shall be good. No longer will we suffer men to find their way to heaven by turning their backs scornfully towards earth; but upon earth they shall make their heaven to come. No longer shall they flee from society to enter solitude, but they shall cause the town to become as peaceful as the forest, and in the midst of society they shall help every one to find a happy solitude in the depths of his and her own breast. No longer shall they divorce religion and common life, but they shall make all life religious, and they shall make religion life. No longer shall they despise and crucify any part of their nature as evil, or distinguish any more between the natural and the spiritual; but they shall reverently unfold and uplift their whole nature, until throughout they become natural-spiritual men, and learn to discover the soul of things in everything, and the true relation of the outward to the inward. We will have our holy man to be a whole man. Sweetness and light, gentleness and strength, meekness and courage, purity and power, simplicity and understanding, modesty and determination, docility and wisdom, shall be united in him. Our Superior Man shall be like our continent,—girt with grace and with might, his character broad and deep. He shall draw strength of will from its everlasting mountains, greatness and steadiness of purpose from its deep and long-flowing rivers, expansiveness of view from its wide-sweeping plains and valleys, beauty and sweetness of spirit from its lovely landscapes clothed with plenty and fragrant with the breath of flowers.

But as yet how far we are from what we say shall be! The average sainthood which we are permitted to behold in our land to-day is not of that handsome type which we trust will hereafter adorn our continent. Now our holy man is still a half man, not a whole one. He is only the product of the popular religion, which product is most incomplete and unsatisfactory. Not that I would affirm that the prevalent religion has produced no saints of the better type, for I believe it has bestowed upon every Christian century some. There are good men and women in all sects, such as we should be willing to have for our neighbors all the year round. We will try to be fair in our judgment. And yet the best and the wisest in the churches are the most dissatisfied with them; this always having been the case. Backsliders from the Church are often worse than the Church; but Come-outers from it are almost invariably better than that they come out from. They come out generally because they grow out, and cannot any longer stay in. In this way Martin Luther grew out of the Church, and George Fox, William Ellery Channing, Theodore Parker, and Ralph Waldo Emerson. A host there are in Christendom who have grown out of the Church and can never go back into it, because they feel it would keep them in a state of halfness, while a state of wholeness (holiness) is what they desire to attain to; and they think they can attain to it better outside.

Let us also be just enough to acknowledge that there are some saints outside of the Church as well as in, whose sainthood causes us to hope that the nobler type is approaching. And this shows us that saintliness is a plant which, to say the least, grows just as well out of doors in the open weather of God, as in the instituted hot-house of ecclesiasticism, under prescribed care and culture. It proves to us conclusively, and ought to prove to everybody, that we cannot invariably identify the good man with the Church-member: because he is the latter, we cannot presume he is also the former. It establishes so much as this beyond all doubt—that the whole question of this or that one being a saint is entirely an open one so far as it relates to his belonging or not belonging to any church, to his attending or not attending any religious meeting, to his observing or not observing customary pious forms and seasons, to his entertaining or not entertaining certain generally received opinions. The time has quite passed by, if indeed it ever was, when these things can be accepted as positive evidences of a saintly type of character. Ralph Waldo Emerson, who never goes to church, who is never seen at his prayers, who is well known to reject the popular belief of Christendom in its Bible, its Church, and its Christ, who accepts no religion but the religion of Nature,—he for all this has just as good credit with his baker, his butcher, and his storekeeper as the most Orthodox of his neighbors, and everywhere where he is well known is esteemed to be equal to the best as a respectable, trustworthy, honest, and amiable gentleman; being such a man on the whole, as to extort from the good Father Taylor this characteristic tribute of respect—that "if a saint like Mr. Emerson should go to hell, the great tide of emigration would be likely to set that way."

After all, we remember it was Jesus who gave us the excellent rule whereby to judge men: "By their fruits ye shall know them." Let us live neighbor to a man, summer and winter, and have daily intercourse and dealings with him, and we shall then be able to judge quite accurately as to his character, irrespective of his conformity or non-conformity to the popular religion.

And this rule which Jesus gives, when applied to a great number of his so-called disciples, reveals a fearful state of insufficiency amongst them; it shows that they are not of the right pattern at all. Were he to come among his professed followers to-day, I am sure he would know but few of them, and but few of them would know him or be willing to receive him. Looking over his flock, he would be obliged to say again, "Not every one that saith unto me 'Lord! Lord!' but he that doeth the will of my Father." The truth is, that much of the goodness which prevails among Christians is not goodness, but goodishness. There is a vast deal of sentimental piety in the community, which is not robust with any virtue. Too many of our saints are like the old ones—tame and sickly and craven, with no healthy blood in them, no bonding pulse full of force and energy. They live and breathe in the debilitating air of sentiment, and are afraid to inflate their lungs from the stimulating breeze of free thought and rational belief. Our popular religion has somehow got divorced from morality, and has lost its heroic element. It is no longer inviting to young men who have high spirit in them, who are full of the enthusiasm of health and hope, and who are going to dare to be and to do something sublime, to try and make this life as good as any. To such the popular religion is not attractive, for it seems lackadaisical, tearful, weak, and cowardly. It would rob them of faith in themselves, of sturdy independence, of manly daring, of naturalness and liberty. It summons them to no high enterprise; it lays upon them no knightly obligations to acquit themselves like heroes and true men.

BODY AND SOUL: A PLEA FOR SPIRITUALISM.

We remember that Jesus says again: "Be ye wise as serpents, and harmless as doves." Our sentimentally good people are harmless enough, but they are almost wholly lacking in the true wisdom. There is a good Saxon word which represents a good Saxon quality, which we need to import into our Saxon religion. That word is pluck. Our public opinion, both in Church and in State, is cowardly. It lacks pluck. In the stress of an emergency, in the face of danger, it does not dare to say its soul is its own. It will again and again, when it is tempted, sell out to Mammon, to power and prestige, and quail before a menace of disturbance and opposition. And private opinion is often more timorous even than public opinion. It is apt upon the least threat to surrender to popularity that which is most precious and worth preserving, and which it ought to defend at all hazards. This absence of the chivalrous and heroic spirit from our politics and our religion, from our public and our private opinion, is the terrible curse of our American civilization. We came near losing the very life and liberty of our nation in consequence of it. So infatuated was this people with the love of prosperity, so demoralized were they with the greed of gain, that it took twenty-five years of constant appeal from the truest saints we had, to bring them to the point where they had the virtue and the courage to say they would resist at all hazards the monstrous fraud and iniquity of human slavery! There is plenty of mere good-naturedness in the community, but that is not enough; we want justice to fight down injustice, stern integrity to put its foot on meanness and hypocrisy, and lion-heartedness to meet all the hosts of evil and wrong and drive them to utter rout. Sentimental goodness will not do; it will never make true saints; it will never produce for us our holy (whole) men. It has a very amiable disposition towards the right. It says with a sweet smile, "How right is right, how good is good, how true is truth! Ah! yes, these ought to be encouraged." But it will not take its stand by these and defend them when they are attacked by worldliness and pride, by prejudice and bigotry, by unfairness and injustice. It will not suffer for them, and sacrifice for them, and work for them, and spend money for them. It is the first to flee when they need its help. It would sell them out, as Judas sold his master, to those who bid highest for them. Shame on such goodness, such religion! It is not worthy of the name; it has no regenerative life in it, but is a poor, weak, flabby, foolish thing.

No: the sainthood we hope for will have force in it as well as sweetness; it will be plucky as well as amiable. It will know the right and, knowing, will dare maintain it. It will take its stand on principle and never depart from it; and should any power or influence approach to tempt it to do so, it will say to it with firm-set will, "Get thee behind me, satan!" It will dare to use plain speech; it will dare to offend those who can be offended because the truth is told; and it will not scruple to hurt the feelings of all whose feelings can be hurt by having a righteous principle vindicated. It will never seek to conciliate anybody by refraining to say or do that which ought to be said and done; and it will never be guilty of a compromise which has to be effected at the least expense of truth and right. This sainthood knows that, at present at least, it goes forth as in the midst of wolves; so it will seek to be wise as a serpent, though harmless as a dove. It will seek to wed in itself religion and morality, thought and sentiment, love and justice, courage and modesty, liberty and law. Its living sacrament will be to succor the helpless and oppressed, to destroy prejudice and bigotry, to throw itself on the side of weakness, of youth, of hope,—on the progressive, expansive side, never on the stationary, conservative, timorous side, "the lock-and-bolt" disposition that would turn water to ice, air to rock, and make everything fixed which is free.

In this day of eager speculation, when the advocates of materialism and its opponents struggle with all the intellectual power at their command to uphold and disseminate their respective theories, simple-minded people are led to ask what it all amounts to in its bearing upon the vital interests of man. If matter be capable of producing all the results which are generally attributed to the action of spirit, and if we cannot understand the essential nature of either, what is it to us which of these opinions is the true one? The consistent materialist would take from us all faith in what we call soul, declaring it baseless and visionary; he would deprive us of belief in God, and give us death for life—that is all. His opponent, although he believes in spirit, and leaves us free to speculate upon its nature as distinguished from matter, may have himself no belief in the great controlling will, the giver of life and the fountain of love whom we call Father, nor in the individual existence of man after the death of the body. He may hold that, when the material form perishes, the vivifying spirit is re-absorbed into the infinite and universal life from which it was evolved.

When some wise man who would be our teacher assures us of the continued existence of the spirit after it has left the body, how can we know that his doctrine is true? Can any one be convinced by logic of the soul's immortality? It would seem impossible that a firm and satisfying faith should be based on this foundation. Some believe in the future life without effort, never asking, because never needing, proof; they believe simply because they cannot help it, which, if not a very reasonable is at least a very unsatisfactory position. Many think they believe because they have been taught that it is right to do so, and swallow faith from a sense of duty as they would take some medicinal draught ordered by a physician in whose skill they trust.

To a multitude of thinking men and women, however, a blind faith is impossible; and since the fact of immortality cannot be proven by argument, what escape have they from doubt or denial, unless somehow and somewhere evidence can be obtained that this belief is well founded? And where is such evidence to be found? Nowhere, if not in Spiritualism.

As I write the word, I feel how many recoil from it as but another name for shameless imposition and vulgar delusion. And yet, if any facts substantiated by the testimony of numberless reliable witnesses are worthy to be respected as such, the proofs received through what are called spiritual phenomena should surely not be regarded with contempt nor turned from with aversion. The manner in which the subject has been treated by many of its advocates has tended to bring it into disrepute among intelligent persons. Never was a wonderful and beautiful truth more vulgarized and belittled. Still the facts remain, and they that have eyes to see, and sense to understand, or at least rationally to investigate them, should disregard the folly of the foolish and the concealed prejudice of the learned, and give to these wonderful phenomena the attention they deserve.

Not man alone, but all things have, in their way, body and soul. Theology is the body of religion; and some among those who love truth too well to fear her are demanding that Science should bring her powers to bear upon this framework of faith, separating the false from the true, the seeming from the real, and building a strong and beautiful tabernacle in which the soul of religion may dwell. This is the proper work of Science; but, having done it, let her stand aside, and look reverently up to those holy emotions and aspirations the worth and the power of which she cannot analyze nor estimate, and which no research can enable the unsympathetic intellect rightly to comprehend. Nature does not yield up her soul into the hands of scientific investigators, who are often too much engrossed by their physical analyses, and too much occupied with their discoveries and their theories to listen to what she is ever saying to those whose ears and hearts are open to receive her most precious utterances. The heroic strength and the patient endurance of self-forgetting love, the yearning aspiration of the suffering and tempted soul for light and strength, which constitutes true prayer, are as real as the facts upon which science is based, and we want no explanation of them save that which every true heart can give. So, in Spiritualism, we ask intelligent men, competent to do the required work, to investigate those physical manifestations which form, so to speak, its body; to tell us, if they can, through what laws matter is acted upon by spirit, or rather by that refined substance which embodies will and intelligence, and which, for want of knowing more about it, we call spirit; while beyond and above these facts, which come within the province of science, there is that which only they who look into them with heart as well as brain, with soul that echoes to soul and love that answers love, can rightly appreciate.

The phenomena of Spiritualism, marvellous as they appear, are, as we all know, not supernatural, but governed by fixed laws; and it is these which Science could perhaps, if she would, help us to understand, so that we might intelligently avail ourselves of their recognized action. Thousands of sane and sensible men and women know that they have, in broad daylight, seen and clasped hands which were as distinctly visible and as firm to the touch as those of flesh, but which appeared suddenly and became again invisible and intangible. Many have, under circumstances absolutely precluding the possibility of deception, seen clearly the faces and forms of friends who have passed through the change we call death, and heard plainly words spoken by their lips. Many have read communications written by no mortal hand, in the well-known autograph of departed friends, stating facts unknown to them at the time, but afterwards verified, and recalling incidents or familiar expressions, in some instances forgotten until thus brought back to the memory.

Surely, such things as these are wonderful enough to be worthy the attention of the wisest man who lives. What if the foolish receive foolishly these marvellous revelations? Should, therefore, the wise not receive them wisely? Is the man of science too busy with his chemicals, his dry leaves, and his insects (all highly respectable teachers in their way), to have time or thought to spare for the investigation of facts like these? No matter how commonplace the manifestations may be. That even raps should be made when they can be accounted for by no known laws; that material objects should be moved by a force indicating intelligence, which as yet no man understands,—if that were all, is there not in it food enough for wonder and reflection? But there is very much more as well as authenticated as this. The writing upon slate or paper, sometimes in a language of which the medium is ignorant, the spoken words, the distinctly visible forms!—why, of all Nature's revelations, should these, so marvellous in themselves and so important in their bearing upon the life and nature of man, be disregarded?

How idle to object that the communications are sometimes unworthy of those from whom they purport to come! What though all those who manifest their presence and their power were fools, and talked only nonsense? Is it not still wonderful enough that these existences, apparitions, call them what you will, can make themselves seen, heard, and felt, can speak and write; and are they not just as wonderful, in a scientific point of view, if they be idiots as if they were all as wise as Socrates? Whether they who thus return are those they claim to be, or whether they are all low, undeveloped spirits from whom we can expect only foolish words and actions, is of no consequence, scientifically regarded. The question of identity must come in long after the simple fact of the occurrence of the alleged phenomena shall be substantiated; and every investigator must, in the end, settle it for himself as his experience and his reason dictate. Let the simple, sensuous facts be first attended to.

Col. Higginson, in speaking of English colleges, tells us that they show a bolder spirit than is found in ours; and it seems that we must look abroad for the men of science who are willing to take a rational and worthy stand in regard to Spiritualism. Prof. C. F. Varley "not only admits the facts, but squarely testifies that these spiritual phenomena are produced by disembodied spirits;" and Prof. Crookes, who has already declared that certain physical phenomena do occur which cannot be explained by any physical law now known, and who is still investigating the subject, will doubtless publish his convictions honestly and fearlessly when he has satisfied himself as to the truth. Why should not some among our men of science do likewise? They know that they have not mastered all knowledge concerning Nature's laws or possibilities; that she has for them, as surely as for the comparatively ignorant, future revelations which will open their eyes to new powers, and force them to modify their opinions concerning those which they partially understand.

Materialists especially, who lay so much stress upon the testimony of the senses, should be the last to require of thousands of their fellow-men that they should treat this testimony as a mere illusion, saying to their eyes, "You see not;" to their ears, "You hear not;" and to their hands, "You feel not!" What can be trusted, if these thousands of sane men and women must refuse to believe what their senses attest? Are they, instead of relying upon this testimony, to accept the assurances of the scientist who, not having seen and not caring to see these things, denies their possibility because they conflict with his very limited knowledge of natural laws? Must men rescue their minds from the thraldom of the Church to sacrifice all trust in themselves to the despots of science, who know absolutely nothing about that which they so dogmatically and scornfully declare to be a vulgar delusion? If the evidence received through the senses and the reason of thousands of disinterested men and women, many of them persons of intelligence and culture, should be insufficient to themselves, and as an idle dream to others, what can suffice to prove anything?

Who understands the essential nature, the origin and limitations of either matter or spirit, and who has mastered the marvels of their union and their inter-action? How much, then, has the wisest man yet to learn, and how should he hope to learn it if he allow logic, even the most specious, to array itself against facts, seeking to convert them by argument, as he would overthrow an opinion or a creed? And where logic is out of place, how much less should he permit blind prejudice to obstruct, with its stupid assumptions, the way which might lead him to new and important discoveries?

It has been said by sensible men, and even by those who desire to be just and liberal, that scientific investigation of spiritual phenomena is made impossible by the conditions imposed; but this, though it be a fact in some cases, is by no means universally true. Certainly, everything has its conditions of being and acting; conditions which we have to take as we find them, because experience has made us aware of their existence whether we can explain them or not. The chemist would have little patience with an ignorant person who should insist that processes requiring to be carried on in darkness should take place in the light. In his laboratory he is forced to recognize, and submit to, these inevitable restrictions. Still, if sensible investigators were required to sit in a darkened room and take certain things for granted, or rely upon the word of others, there would assuredly be ample ground for this allegation; but the truth is that, with a powerful medium, nothing in the external is required which makes it impossible, or even difficult, for an intelligent and honest investigator to see for himself that the phenomena called spiritual really do take place. When, as to mental conditions, nothing is demanded but that he should bring to this investigation that earnest and humble spirit of inquiry which should characterize the philosopher in all his researches, what more can be exacted?

It is undoubtedly true that the critical and continuous investigation of these phenomena is, from their nature, far more difficult than experiments with objects and agents whose presence can be commanded at pleasure, and the governing laws of which are better understood. These things will often elude the grasp of those who would hold them for critical scrutiny. They must be taken, with their intrinsic peculiarities, just as they are. The difficulties in the way of exhaustive research are inevitable, and may, perhaps, prove in the end insurmountable; but it is not at least premature to be discouraged by difficulties anticipated in the after-steps of investigation before the first have been taken? In the honest and earnest effort to understand and explain these things, though the research should be only partially successful, a key might be found to open some closed door; some facts might reveal themselves to the patient questioner, and all facts are worth knowing,—as guides to him who desires, before all things, to enlarge the boundaries of his present field of knowledge. The material phenomena should thus have interest for every student of Nature; while to those who desire to obtain evidences of the indestructible life of man, which they have failed to find elsewhere, Spiritualism appeals. Whether the proofs she offers be incontrovertible, must necessarily depend not only upon what they are in themselves, but also upon the mental characteristics of the person to whom the revelation is made. To many thinking men, once entirely sceptical in regard to a future life, they have sufficed; but since there are minds so constituted that, after all the daily experiences of life, they deny the existence of matter, and others whom neither mental perception nor argument avails to convince of the existence of mind, no conceivable proof can possibly ensure to all a belief in anything.

What Spiritualism teaches to those who have become convinced of the spiritual origin of the manifestations is, that we live upon this earth, not as highly organized bodies, vitalized by a materially generated force, but as embodied spirits; and that, when that which is mortal dies, the indwelling man is left, just what he was before: a man, with all his individual characteristics and imperfections unchanged; clothed in a form as real as that which clothed him here, though less grossly material; invisible and intangible to us only because our bodily senses are not fitted to see and feel this subtle substance, but able under certain conditions to gather about itself, from elements or emanations made available by some peculiar power possessed by those we call mediums, a materialized form, perceptible to our senses but capable of being instantly dissipated, resolving itself into its invisible constituents, as water may be made to do by the passing of an electric current through it.

For men who claim to be wiser than the multitude, and especially for those to whom Nature stands for God, should not all the ways she opens seem good, seeing that towards some precious truth they all must tend? What though the goal be invisible, and there be labyrinths to be threaded, which may bewilder and baffle for a time the philosopher who, striving to follow where she leads, is but a little questioning child after all, and wisest when he realizes his ignorance, objecting to nothing which she offers for his investigation, and cavilling at no conditions which she imposes. May the truly wise come bravely and humbly to this work; and so, at last, through denial, and doubt, and faithful seeking, may the truth be brought to light, both matter and spirit standing to all for what they really are, whatever that may be.

"And in this twofold sphere—the twofold man
Hold firmly to the natural, to reach
The spiritual beyond it—daring still
The type with mortal vision, to place there
With eyes immortal, to the antitype.
Some call the ideal,—better called the real,
And certain to be called so presently
When things shall have their names."

LOUISA ANDREWS.

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S THEOLOGY.

[From the Boston Commonwealth.]

In the year 1858 Mr. Beecher lectured in the Fraternity course in this city, on a general subject. It was a simple matter in itself, and called for no comment. But the Fraternity lectures having their origin with Theodore Parker's people, the Examiner, a Baptist journal of New York, deemed it its duty to remind him of his impropriety in accepting an invitation from such heretics. Thereupon Mr. Beecher wrote to the managers to know what was done with the proceeds of the lectures, and soon after, in the Independent, defended his right to lecture when and where he pleased, with his usual force and directness when in controversy. This was a simple matter, also, calling for little comment, except in approbation of his independence. But in this reply Mr. Beecher ventured to state his theological ground-work in these words, which at once stamped him with the "faithful" as questionable, if not unsound; for it was to most readers incomprehensible:—

"Could Theodore Parker worship my God? Christ Jesus is his name. All that there is of God to me is bound up in that name. A dim and shadowy effluence rises from Christ, and that I am taught to call the Father. A yet more tenuous and invisible film of thought arises, and that is the Holy Spirit. But neither are to me aught tangible, restful, accessible."

Fourteen years have gone by, and now we have Mr. Beecher making a new declaration. His contempt for the Cambridge confession of Calvinism has long been no secret, and the other Sunday it was openly expressed by him in a way that apparently "did him good." The most obnoxious clause in that confession appeared to be the following, which the reverend gentleman read with a terrible emphasis:—

"By the decree of God, and for the manifestation of his glory, some men and some angels are predestinated to everlasting ruin, and some are foreordained to everlasting death."

The painfully intense interest with which the congregation drank in the terrible words was hardly diverted by the criticism which followed it, which was simply, "That is rather rough, is it not?" He went on reading until he came to the following:—

"These angels and men, thus predestinated and foreordained, are fixed to an unchangeable destiny; their number is certain and defined, and cannot be increased or diminished."

"That is what you may call a tight fit," said the eloquent commentator. Mr. Beecher added: "If I were left to choose between absolute infidelity and atheism, and the acceptance of a God who has pre-ordained and predestinated an innumerable host of his creatures to torments, to pains, and to eternal death, for his praise and his glory, why, rather than accept such an infernal deity, I would be an atheist, and I would glory therein."

A murmur of suppressed applause followed this bold pronouncement. Mr. Beecher then turned to the sermons of Dr. Binney, preached from the same pulpit, in one of which Dr. Binney said that there were those sitting before him who in the eternal ages should suffer more of the torments of the damned than the volume of all that was painful, all that was dreadful, to the souls then waiting in hell. Mr. Beecher said: "It is to a Being like this that we say, 'Our Father.' Why, if there were one soul that was predestined by him to such a hopeless inheritance of woe, I would say 'Our Fiend'—not 'Our Father.'"

Our local organ of New England Orthodoxy, the Congregationalist, upon this declaration, takes occasion to clear modern Congregationalism of the imputations put upon it. It says:—

"While the Boston council of 1855 did reaffirm, for substance, the old and elaborate confessions, it framed and set forth a new declaration of faith which wholly avoids the statements to which objection is made, and which it would have been more honest in Mr. Beecher to have quoted as expressing the faith of the New England Congregational churches. In one sense he can justify his accusation, but in another sense it is false, harmful, and as cruel to the churches whom he represents as is the formula with which he quarrels. The doctrines which they hold are far from being as monstrous as, in the heat of extemporaneous and extravagant discourse, Mr. Beecher would make the public believe."

The Fraternity people should re-invite Mr. Beecher to lecture this fall, and have this whole matter gone over with thoroughness by him.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S. — Dean Stanley may easily have met Roman Catholics, who, at the mention of this or other priestly crimes, shrug their shoulders, make a grimace, and intimate, rather by gesture than by word, that all this belonged to a past age, and that they would rather have nothing to say to it. But no Roman Catholic, who is one in truth as well as in name, will disavow the deed. He will not obtrude it. He will not glory in it. He will not even refer to it, unless he be compelled; but he will defend it by historical as well as by dogmatical arguments. So far from its being disavowed, there can be no doubt that the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day is the fact of all others present to the mind when it is said, as Roman Catholics often do say, that persecution, to do its work, must be thorough. It is an ordinary platitude of Protestant talkers that persecution never converts. "Perhaps not," is the reply; "but it can destroy, which answers the purpose." The fault of all ineffective persecutions is that they have been conducted with only half a heart, by men who were not quite sure they were right, and who accordingly left the roots of the cancer they had not the courage to cut out entirely. The Ultramontanes can appeal to a few persecutions which have done their work. France is the most complete example of successful, because thorough, persecution. It was the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day that turned back France from following the example of Germany and England, and left her a Catholic country. Who, then, fears to name it? Who disavows the deed? No Catholic does, so far as the Times knows; at least, nobody whose authority, as entitled to speak for his church, can be introduced into this question.—London Times.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at OGDON HALL, St. Clair Street, on Sunday evenings, at 7½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

CASH RECEIPTS.

For the week ending December 14.—Joseph Mayer, $5 cts.; Julius Rosenthal, $5; Henry Pearson, $5; Henry N. Webb, $5; Geo. C. Glatt, $5.00; E. P. Herd, $1.50; William Allen, $1.00; John E. Haynes, $5; A. V. Bentley, $5; Orlando Davis, $5; W. C. Preston, $5; A. L. Munroe, $13; E. Smith, $5; C. O. Corwell, $1; S. G. Coray, $5; Henry Giles, $5; J. P. Borne, $5 cts.; Isaac Ames, $5; E. P. Thompson, $5; S. P. Putnam, $5; D. J. Francis, $5; Miss E. T. Parker, $5; C. A. Barlow, $5; E. C. Bradshaw, $5; Edward Ayers, $5; Lydia Hinkle, $5; J. F. Noyes, $5; I. P. Bradley, $5; J. H. Carter, $5; A. M. Howland, $5; Geo. B. Blake, Jr., $5; Wm. Blanchard, $5; C. S. Watkins, $5; Edmund Jackson, $5 cts.; H. M. Smith, $5 cts.; W. W. Wilson, $5 cts.; John H. Lull, $13.25; Anna Dorman, $5.35; J. A. Vezio, $1.70; B. Felsenfeld, $5.70; Nath'l Cummings, $5.00; Jon. P. Barrett, $5.00; Alex. Metzger, $5.00; H. B. Howe, $5.00; A. C. Woodruff, $5 cts.; Mrs. E. Sprague, $5 cts.; Abel Hunt, $5 cts.; Matt. H. Ellis, $5 cts.; J. S. Hill, $10; J. P. Lindsey, $5 cts.; Chas. Almy, $5 cts.; 10 cts.; Henry A. Ward, $5 cts.; W. E. Shepherd, $10; Jno. Turley, $1.75; Allen Latham, $5 cts.; Geo. C. Meyer, $5 cts.; D. Arter, $5 cts.; Miss A. Marchand, $5.40; E. P. Cook, $5.30; E. K. Sanborn, $5.15; Chas. A. Gould, $1.00; P. W. Marsh, $1; Chas. E. Parker, $5.50; Z. Brockert, $5; W. Maddaugh, $5.00; F. J. Hoerner, $5; M. E. B. Welch, $5; S. B. Roper, $5; L. S. Barnes, $1; John Whitaker, $5; Wm. H. Dixon, $5; Geo. S. Bowen, $5; W. H. Thurman, $5 cts.; H. B. Clarke, $5.00; Chas. J. Seymour, $5; W. H. Burr, $5; Herman McEllen, $5; August Wangerlin, $5; Jacob Weisberg, $5; J. Kraus & Co., $5; J. P. Miller, $5; A. B. Beck, $5; Adolph Gauder, $5; Charles Anke, $5; H. W. Luckemeyer, $5; Frank Blum, $1.00; P. Kieferer, $1.50; J. B. Rhoder, $1.50; Wm. Jassand, $1.50; P. L. Kessler, $5 cts.; E. Goetz, $5 cts.; C. B. Krause, Jr., $5 cts.; Philip Gauselien, $5 cts.; G. A. Kolbe, $5 cts.; C. W. Schmidt, $5 cts.; H. C. Buech, $5 cts.; Henry Schneider, $5; H. Tobin, $5 cts.; E. Boynton, $5; I. M. Russell, $5; C. B. Knowlton, $1; W. H. Temple, $5 cts.; D. E. Mallory, $5 cts.; Milton DeHase, $5 cts.; William D. Balch, $5; Chas. Graeter, $5; Geo. C. Prussing, $5; Henrietta Hyde, $5; R. C. Ingersoll, $5; E. C. Ingersoll, $5; I. F. Porter, $5; I. Walz, $5; H. Sablin, $1.50; Wm. Edgar Pird, $1; Hiram W. Hunt, $5; Edwin Swain, $5; Wm. R. Cameron, $5; Jane M. Distenfeld, $5; S. H. Morris, $1; J. A. Marshall, $5; Chester F. Harlow, $5; Fred Sonnenberg, $5 cts.; John Saval, $5 cts.; Henry Ludwig, $1.50; John Wm. Grimp, $5; El Strong, $1; F. W. Morgan, $5; B. F. Stamm, $10; J. P. Atwater, $5 cts.; S. H. Roper, $5.00; G. A. Stebbins, $10; Sam'l Grammer, $5 cts.; A. C. Nickerson, $5 cts.; H. W. Clapp, $5 cts.; E. S. Dunham, $5.00; Mrs. L. M. Plummer, $10; Nath'l Little, $10; Nath'l Little, Jr., $10; Mrs. E. Crosby, $10.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipts unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—THE INDEX is payable in advance. Its friends should not be offended if the paper is stopped at the expiration of their terms as indicated by the mail-tags. We have no means of knowing whether they wish it continued or not except by the receipt or non-receipt of the subscription price.

N. B.—Please examine the ADDRESS and DATE on your INDEX mail-tag, and report at once any error in either.

N. B.—If your INDEX mail-tag is not changed within three weeks after renewing your subscription, please notify us immediately. But do not write before the expiration of that time.

N. B.—Postage on THE INDEX is five cents per quarter, dating from receipt of the first number, payable in advance at the place of delivery.

N. B.—Please remit by post-office money-order, by registered letter, or by draft on New York. Checks on interior banks are liable to discount, and the term of subscription will be proportionally shortened in the credit.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

N. B.—In case of any error in your mail-tag, always state the post-office at which the paper is received, and also the name just as it is now printed. Then state any desired correction.

N. B.—When writing about a former remittance, always give the date of such remittance as exactly as possible.

CAPITAL $100,000. ————— SHARES EACH $100.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO 1902.
ACKNOWLEDGED elsewhere,	Nine Hundred Shares,	$90,000
ARNOLD TANSER, New York,	N. Y.,	One	100
A. M. LEE,	"	"	100
PARDON ARBINGTON, Lawrence,	Mass.,	"	100
Mrs. H. E. PERKINS, Dover,	N. H.,	"	100
Miss EMILY BUCK, New York,	N. Y.,	"	100
J. GOLDMAN,	"	"	200
CHAS. A. GURLEY, Pulaski,	N. Y.,	Two	200
ALEX COCHAN, Franklin,	Pa.,	Five	500
Mrs. L. M. PLUMMER, Newbury,	Mass.,	One	100
NATHANIEL LITTLE,	"	"	100
NATHANIEL LITTLE, JR.,	"	"	100
CHARLES EDMUNDS, Oberlin,	Ohio,	"	100
S. NAUWUM, New York,	N. Y.,	"	100
ANDREW E. WHITMORE, Ilios,	Mass.,	"	100
CHAS. BUTTER, Lyon,	"	"	100
Mrs. A. F. COTTIS, Cambridgeport	"	"	100
J. JOHN McDOUFF,	"	"	100
Mrs. M. E. BRAD, New York,	N. Y.,	"	100
L. E. BROCKWAY, Brooklyn,	"	One	100
A. LOOE, Philadelphia,	Pa.,	"	100
PETER LESTIN, Germantown,	"	Two	200
R. M. WHITFLE, Chicago,	Ill.,	"	200
Mrs. S. B. HERRY, Washington,	D. C.,	One	100
Miss E. T. COWHERT, " "	"	"	100
CED H. FRANGIS, Monclair,	N. J.,	"	100
DARIUS LYMAN, Washington,	D. C.,	"	100
WM. U. HEAD, Philadelphia,	Pa.,	"	100
A. L. MUNROE, Rockford,	Ill.,	"	100
Mrs. H. T. CAMPBELL, Jersey City,	N. J.,	"	100
WM. BERGUAN, Brooklyn,	N. Y.,	"	100
JAS. W. WHITE, Jersey City,	N. J.,	Five	500
			$91,300

DECEMBER 21, 1872.

BUSINESS NOTICE.—All communications without exception, on all matters pertaining to the paper, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, DRAWERS, CLEVELAND, OHIO." All cheques, drafts, and money orders, should be made payable to "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION." No responsibility is assumed for loss of money or neglect in the fulfilment of orders, unless these directions are STRICTLY COMPLIED WITH.

HORACE GREELEY.

There are two-fold and special reasons why Horace Greeley's death should receive further notice in these columns than what has already been given to it. In the first place, although Mr. Greeley was never identified in the least, so far as we know, with the cause of Free Religion as represented by THE INDEX, he was yet so thorough a Liberal in every sense of the word as to rank him pre-eminently amongst the advanced, progressive thinkers and workers of the time. A man of deep and strenuous convictions was he—perhaps a man of prejudices (if any one could be excused for indulging in these, he might, because his pre-judgments were so often instinctively accurate); but above all he was through his whole life a conspicuous and consistent seeker, welcomer, defender, and server of new ideas, untrammelled thought, and every measure of reform which promised well for humanity. The paper which he founded and built up to the very zenith of success was literally a tribune where every truth, even the most unpopular, could always go and take its stand, and where it could speak to the people from a most assured and advantageous position. It is hardly too much to say, that not a reform can be named which has within the last thirty years challenged the attention of American society, but owes no small debt of gratitude to the New York Tribune for hospitable and kindly treatment of it. Mr. Greeley obtained his famous soubriquet of "the

Mr. Greeley's religious liberalism is further evidenced in the fact, that, at the time of his death, he was president of the Liberal Club of New York, which, if we rightly apprehend it, holds a somewhat similar relation to the theology of the empire city as the Radical Club in Boston to the theology of that high centre of American rationalism. That a man of his busy cares, so deeply immersed in politics, so pursued by the multitudinous labors of his editorial profession, should have had any special interest in theolog-

So we add our tears to the tears of the many at Horace Greeley's death; we stand with the great throng beside his bier and look reverently and gratefully upon his bland and benignant face; we follow with the long procession to his grave, and there at last we say: "Farewell, honest man, brave reformer, liberal thinker, wise benefactor! Thou art more honorable and not less honored, as thou liest in thy elvish robes, than if thou wert clothed with the regalia and attended with the pomp of the highest office in the land!"

A. W. B.

It is a foolish fear that science may kill poetry by substituting exact knowledge for fervid imagination. Light reveals the beauty that darkness hides.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Attention is called to the fact that the advertisement of Publications of the Free Religious Association, in another column of THE INDEX, has been revised by withdrawing a considerable portion of it. All the Publications, excepting the Report for this year and the Discourse on "Reason and Revelation," were destroyed in the Boston Fire. With the exception of those named, they were all stored at the warehouse of Mr. Hallowell, the Treasurer, who was one of the Wool Merchants of Federal Street who were so disastrously burned out. Compared with his great loss, the Association suffers a small one. The pecuniary value, however, of the books destroyed was not inconsiderable; yet the loss will be especially felt by those persons who desire to make their files of the Association's Annual Reports complete. Possibly a few numbers may be gathered from Agents who have had them for sale, but for the present no orders can be filled for any Annual Report previous to that of 1872; nor for Mr. Higginson's "Sympathy of Religions," Mr. Channing's "Religious of China," nor Mr. Johnson's "Worship of Jesus."

WM. J. POTTER,
Secretary, F. R. A.

THE OLD SOUTH CHURCH IN BOSTON AS A POST OFFICE.

It is a curious illustration of the spirit of our times, of the mingling of reverence for the past with the new reconsideration of all questions in their practical bearings, that while outside citizens, professing no sympathy with the doctrines of the Old South Church, were rejoicing that the fire had spared this venerable edifice, and left it still to stand as a landmark of the olden times, the trustees had already consented to lease it to the government for a post-office,—of course giving up its character of peculiar sanctity forever.

We, certainly, who profess to believe that the serving of humanity by the punctual transmission of letters of love and service from one to another is a religious occupation as well pleasing to God as singing psalms or preaching sermons, have no right to complain; but old habits are strong, and we cannot get over a little feeling of regret at seeing the old church that stood so quiet and still through the week days,—only connected with the busy world below by its clock which slowly tolled the hours which brought near the day of rest, its day of occupation and life,—become a part of the restless, busy crowd itself, filled with hurrying, restless feet all day long, and its fair whiteness soiled with the mud and filth which humanity still drags along with it.

Still more incongruous does it seem that those who put on the old church only a few years ago, "Desecrated by British troops in 1775,"—thus perpetuating the memory of an old grievance which more than fifty years of peace should have suffered to fade out of remembrance,—should consent to what might seem a similar "making of my Father's house a house of merchandise."

But after all, except that the end will probably be the destruction of the building which helps to give character and picturesque effect to the monotonous newness which must prevail over the rebuilt district, is there any cause for surprise or regret at this result?

Our Puritan Fathers did not believe in the distinctively sacred character of their church edifices. It was long the custom, and is still in country places, to hold town-meetings in the parish meeting-house. Various notices also, sometimes quite secular in character, were given out on Sunday, and the weekly paper was often distributed in church to those who lived at an inconvenient distance from the post-office. It is still the custom in Southern negro churches to distribute letters after the close of the religious exercises. It was very touching after the close of the war, to hear the inquiries for missing relatives thus read by the pastors. In fact, the church organization was the only place where the slave's individuality was recognized, and their record of membership offered the best opportunity of tracing out those who had long been separated.

So if the house consecrated to religion is to become a centre of trade, we will hope that it is a sign that the old motto, "Religion is religion and business is business," no longer represents the prevailing sentiment; but that religion is held to be in its true place as much at the counter as in the pulpit, quietly infusing its spirit of love and truth and reverence into every concern of human life. If the Old South steeple, pointing upwards over the daily and nightly hurry of the post-office, still speaks this lesson to us, we shall not feel that it is desecrated, but consecrated anew to the service of God and Humanity.

E. D. C.

PAINE.

It is not a happy omen for the future conduct of the N. Y. Tribune that the number which recorded the death of Horace Greeley contained a bitter and uncalled for article on Thomas Paine. Not that Mr. Greeley loved or appreciated Paine, or would have spoken of him any more kindly, if occasion prompted him to speak at all. Mr. Greeley was not large minded in his theological opinions, nor particularly tolerant of people who disagreed with him, nor specially willing to do justice to persons called "infidels." But Mr. Greeley would not have spoken till he had a better occasion than the christening of Paine Hall in Boston, and in speaking he would perhaps have refrained from insulting, with stupid misjudgment, a large and respectable class of his fellow citizens.

We have no disposition to eulogize Paine, nor make him out a greater and better man than he was. We do not think "that the political services of Paine during our Revolution have been over-estimated;" we feel disposed indignantly to deny that "his personal habits were about as bad as they have been represented to be by his theological opponents;" we are not inclined to admit that "he lacked almost every quality which should mark an investigator of religious truth." On the contrary we contend that he rendered valuable service in his time, both to statesmanship, public opinion, and religion; and we are firmly persuaded that he has received much less than justice at the hands of all but a very few Americans. That he had a "small, sharp mind" may be doubted; that he was "of a naturally coarse nature" is to be admitted with qualification; that "his theological writings are of no value whatever" can be said only with a strong emphasis on the "are;" for though they have been superseded by a vastly nobler literature, they were substantial contributions to the crude criticism of their age.

But let this pass. The books and the characteristics of Paine are fair subjects for comment, so the comment itself be fair. He was not by any means an eternal man, but a man of the hour, and by his influence on the hour he must be judged. Writers like this Tribune man do not remember that; theological partisans of course do not remember it; nor do they remember that the safe rule by which all men are to be judged is that which considers what they did rather than what they did not accomplish, what they did rather than what they did not purpose. The modern method in history regards individuals as contributing somehow to progress, credits them therefore with their mite, and makes their age a sharer in their limitations. By bearing this rule in mind, Paine's critics will honor themselves if they do not him.

Our complaint, however, is that the writer in the Tribune uses the popular dislike of Paine, and the naming of the hall in Boston, as an occasion of fixing opprobrium on the persons who are erecting the hall, and on the holders of so-called "infidel" opinions wherever they may be found. To call the building "Paine Hall" may be a mistake; we think it is. "Parker Hall" would be a much better name on every account, as being more modern, and as defining more justly the position of the inaugurators of the undertaking, were it not that another organization is erecting a hall to Parker's memory. But the adoption of a name should not commit the bestowers of it to opinions they do not accept and perhaps are not familiar with. It does not justify their classification with people "who, while attacking the creeds of others, have none of their own to offer, except a lenten feast of the dry husk of negation;" it does not excuse the association of them with "a scepticism which is bolsterous and blatant, insolent and aggressive; which uses the weapons of ridicule with a remorseless rellish; which, when a saint has gone into his closet to pray, howls at him through the key-hole, and keeps up a running and ridiculous commentary upon his devotions." Such abuse as this is unworthy of the meanest sectarian organ; it is bestowed on any class of persons in an American community; it is inapplicable to the majority of the very small company who profess to be disciples of Paine; it is a gross caricature of the editor of the Investigator, the nearest approach to the "school" of Paine in this neighborhood; and it misses by the whole distance between two opposite poles the friends and followers of Paine's illustrious successor, Theodore Parker.

The writer says truly, "Of such discussion of Christianity (as that of Paine) we are sure that the world has had enough. Nor do we think that the world is likely to have much more of it." He might have added, instead of implying, nay, of asserting the contrary, that the people who justify that statement most completely are the very people whom he accuses of building a monument to Tom Paine, the pupils of Theodore Parker, whose methods were as unlike Paine's as the middle of the nineteenth century is unlike the middle of the eighteenth. Paine's methods are outgrown; no thanks, however, to the theologians, or to the "evangelical" Christians. Thanks rather to the enlightened intelligence which, in spite of them, enjoys greater knowledge and wider views. The men who have left Paine farthest behind are the men who are grateful to him for standing in advance of his benighted generation.

O. B. F.

SPIRITUAL CONFLICTS IN ENGLAND.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—We are all in a healthy state of fermentation just now. There are no signs of that terrible complacency and contentment so ominous of death.

It is true that one cannot love strife, nor take unalloyed pleasure in witnessing the convulsive struggles of a dying cause, knowing as we do that pain—very real and often intense—must wring the hearts of those who engage fiercely in any controversy. But anything is better than apathy or a selfish indifference to everything which is not sordid. We are rightly accused in this age of greediness of gain, and some of our philosophers have defended war on the ground that it rouses men from their immersion in money-grubbing. In like manner we ought to welcome the spiritual conflicts which are going on around us, as tending to raise men out of their animalism, and to teach them to believe in something higher and more worthy of pursuit than gold.

Among these conflicts the Sunday Question seems to be the most prominent. I will not inflict upon your readers a repetition of the arguments for and against the opening of museums and picture galleries on Sunday. We are sick to death of reading them in almost every paper we touch. But it will interest you over in America quite as much as it does us here, to know how fierce and unscrupulous is the opposition to this humane proposal. The East End of London is all but involved in civil war, owing to the exercise of clerical influence and to the tactics in which it has been manifested. There can be no doubt as to the opinions of the masses on the subject; but then the masses do not always get their own way—far from it. And it is not unlikely that clerical pressure may be brought to bear upon the bishops so as to secure their opposition to any bill for throwing open museums on Sunday.

Side by side with this conflict in the East is a contest going on between the National Sunday

League and the Sabbatarians, but in this case it is no open war of words, but a mean, underhanded, spiteful attempt to shut them out of St. George's Hall.

I must explain that what are called "Sunday Evenings for the People" are semi-religious entertainments, highly popular and always crowded, at which so-called "sacred music" is performed, and a lecture on some useful subject delivered for the instruction of the people. By some accident or oversight the contract of the League with the lessee of the hall was not signed; but a portion of the rent had been paid, covering about five Sundays. "Pressure," as it is termed, had been put upon the lessee to induce him to refuse the hall to the Sunday League after the fifth or sixth Sunday. Some thought it came from the Lord Chamberlain's office, and indeed one of the secretaries had written unofficially to the lessee; but it appears that the Lord Chamberlain admitted that he had no right to stop the "Sunday Evenings." The lessee, however, still professes to be in fear of losing his license, and this of course is too serious a matter to be trifled with. Others thought that perhaps the Orthodox party had bid higher for the hall, and to gain their end had worked upon the lessee through the Lord Chamberlain's office. At all events, at this moment the issue is uncertain, and the League may yet be driven out to find new quarters.

Another healthy sign of activity is a movement on the part of the bishops calling upon all the clergy to set apart one week in December for fervent prayer to God to provide them with missionaries to the heathen. This looks as if they were in a bad way, for the Orthodox are wont to help themselves as long as they can—very wisely—and when all other resources fail they flee to prayer. I remember well, on a voyage of unusual severity of weather the purser coming to me, as chaplain, to ask me to summon the passengers and crew to prayers on account of our danger. It was a sure sign that we were in danger; and so I regard this prescribed week of prayer as an indication of the hopeless condition of the missionary cause. But the decay and dissolution of proselytism has been coming on so long that it does not now take us by surprise.

I remember, too, how an alliance for prayer was made twenty years ago, between evangelical Christians, for the "special outpouring of the Holy Ghost," and how a far-seeing member of that alliance said, "If God gives us the Holy Ghost, we shall many of us dislike the truth which he may teach us;" and the issue justified his remark. The Holy Spirit opened the eyes of numbers of the faithful, and produced a change in their views which led to the production of such books as Essays and Reviews, and Bishop Colenso's Examination of the Pentateuch. We must hope that the prayers for missionaries will be followed by a large army of deserters from Orthodoxy.

Another healthy sign which I must mention is that Mr. Lyne, alias Father Ignatius, and Mr. Bradlaugh meet on a common platform, each to announce his own convictions before an audience nominally of Freethinkers. The first meeting was distinguished for the perfect harmony and good feeling which prevailed; both speakers being listened to without interruption. From the report of the addresses, both of them seemed to me to hit out very wildly. I suppose it will take time for each combatant to select his ground and his best method of attack; but at present it is little more than bare assertion on the one side, and bare denial on the other. Still it will do good to both parties, and make each more modest in his own opinion.

I have been lecturing at Bedford after all, and out of an audience of two hundred, only thirty or forty were sympathizers with my views. They all behaved with a splendid patience, and only towards the close of my lecture, when my knife touched the "nervous centre," viz., the Deity of Christ, did one or two persons rush from the room to save the last bit of their cherished idol.

I am, sir, yours very sincerely,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE,
DULWICH, S. E., Nov. 30, 1872.

The entire civilized world will be interested in the results of the great circumnavigating Exploring Expedition, soon to be sent out by the British government. The vessel is H. M. S. Challenger, a main-deck corvette of 2,206 tons, now lying at Sheerness. Capt. G. S. Nares has been appointed commander of the expedition, and Prof. Wyville Thomson director of the scientific staff, which is large and well selected. The Challenger will make a cruise of between three and four years, visiting a vast number of places all over the globe, and making scientific investigations of all kinds, especially sounding and dredging the deep sea. She is fitted up with all conceivable conveniences for scientific purposes, and is supplied with the best possible apparatus of all kinds. Her voyage will be followed with the attention and interest of all who are interested in the progress of science; and undoubtedly a great number of most important discoveries will be made during its continuance.

The above information is derived from Nature for October 31, this excellent weekly scientific journal edited by Mr. J. Norman Lockyer, of London, and published by Macmillan & Co., from whom it can be ordered at 38 Bleeker Street, New York. The yearly subscription price is $5.00; and we heartily wish that the American public were better acquainted with its great merits. No one who desires to be kept informed of the latest discoveries and freshest thought in the realm of science should neglect to take it.

The subjoined is from the Woman's Journal of November 18:—

"THE INDEX indulges in the following conservative platitudes:—

"It is commonly claimed that the solution of the problem how to get rid of intemperance awaits only the arrival of Woman Suffrage. That is a dreary blunder. It awaits the arrival of Free Religion in the head and heart of every individual. Suffrage, whether male or female, can never deal with that problem. Look for its solution to education, industry, and virtue."

The Woman's Journal would probably rewrite the offensive paragraph somewhat in this manner: "It is commonly claimed that the solution of the problem how to get rid of intemperance awaits only the arrival of Woman Suffrage. This claim is a divine truth. Suffrage, either male or female, is perfectly competent to deal with that problem. The very minute that women obtain the ballot, they will immediately vote that nobody shall get drunk any more, and that no more liquor shall be made or sold. The liquor traffic shall immediately vanish, and even lemonade shall fall into disrepute. Education, industry, and virtue have nothing to do with the temperance reform; woman suffrage will make everybody temperate, no matter how ignorant, idle, or vicious he may be."

Is this what the dreadful radical meant who was so shocked by our "conservative platitudes?"

After Gen. Harrison's election in 1840, Horace Greeley was called upon by the friends of the president elect, who desired Mr. Greeley to tell them what office he expected in reward for the brilliant and efficient services he had rendered in that campaign in behalf of the Whigs. "Office!" said Mr. Greeley, "I want no office. I work for the cause." Let this be the motto of all who labor in behalf of Free Religion. Let there be no small jealousies nor rivalries, no self-seeking, no strife for rank or dignity among such co-laborers. We "work for the cause," and only that; and our sole ambition should be to give it the largest, best, and most unselfish service.

A. W. S.

A correspondent asks for the true account of the closing hours of Voltaire's life, with reference to the stories of his horrible death. Mr. Morley, in his recent admirable biography of Voltaire, gives no such stories; and we place no great reliance on the evidence heaped up by those who manifestly wish to make out a case against the great leonoclast of France. But we have no means at hand for proving or disproving it; nor is it of the least consequence, so far as the truth of radical opinions is concerned, whether Voltaire, or any other man, died in ecstasy or in despair. The weaknesses of men make no truth a falsehood; their virtues make no falsehood true.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

MENTAL HEALTH VS. MEDIUMSHIP.

True mental health can only consist in the untrammelled use of our intellectual faculties through their normal development. The old reply of the ploughman to the dyspeptic inquirer, that he "had no system," was an indication of physical health. The healthy man has no knowledge of the operations performed by his secretory organs. In health they perform their work silently and naturally, and only disease brings them into prominence in our consciousness. They have then assumed an unnatural character, and we are forcibly reminded of their existence. Even so in mental and spiritual health; the organs of the mind must work with a natural spontaneity, neither forced nor starved.

Whatever assumes to give us a royal road to knowledge in any direction, other than that worked out by our own faculties, or pretends to reveal to us the mysteries of time, is unnatural and would produce an unhealthy state of mental growth. Man must hew out his own knowledge rather than obtain it by gift, if he would not stagnate in imbecility. Thought kindles thought; as the light applied to the slow-match sends activity into the heart of the rock, so does an idea once fully possessed awaken a train of ideas, until the whole shell—in which custom so often encases the mind—shakes and crumbles away before its active powers. If our ideas are obtained by impressions from without through mechanical means, mental activity can never ensue. The organs of man are the outlets of an indwelling, controlling force, not the inlets of knowledge by mechanical control. Man has been defined as an intelligence served by organs; he is not an organism merely serving others. Man has a nobler mission than to serve as a spiritual water-pot in the hands of any hypothetical "influence," either of the earth earthy or of the spheres "sublimated."

The grand pre-requisite for mental independence is to have a soul within us, an animating, invigorating, inspiring soul, not an "etherialized" counterpart of the physical man, who is to continue his etherialization through a seven-fold existence hereafter, unless sooner re-incarnated; but a soul that can recognize divine order here, and by and through its own faculties will put itself in keeping with it: something in us that will stir up all our slumbering powers into new activities under the dominating rule of a purpose, without which we may as well be automatic implements in the hands of others, mere voluble dischargers of second-hand thought; for without purpose all powers are useless.

What is it to us to know that "the first sphere is the natural; the second the spiritual; the third the celestial; the fourth the supernatural; the fifth the superspiritual; the sixth the supercelestial; the seventh the Infinite Vortex of Love and Wisdom"? No! Nature's divine revelations teach us not of the names of conditions of being held in store by her, but to so live and develop our own transcendent powers as to insensibly pass into those higher conditions.

"To know that which before us lies
Is the prime wisdom: what is more is fume,
Or emptiness, or fond imperiousness;
And renders us in that which most concerns us
Unpractised, unprepared."

Words are but the garments of thought. Terminology can never take the place of the animating idea. Thought is needed, clothing itself in action, to make the truly self-reliant man. Soul once attained, all is attainable; thought then necessarily breaks forth into action, and so far as the actions are unconscious, the result of spontaneity, is mental health indicated. Many of our Spiritualist friends seem to regard mental action as a mechanical influx, instead of a spontaneous outgrowth; no inner fire burns on the hearth to warm the whole man into a healthy activity, raising a torpid purpose into a sovereign principle, but rather the cold reflection of distant star-beams which, however deep they may penetrate, can excite no molecular motion. The man of purpose, intensely realizing the duties of the present, has neither time nor inclination to spare in profitless inquiries concerning the vocations and avocations of the departed.

"Life is real, life is earnest;"

and a healthy, natural condition of the mental faculties rejects all external developing processes of the mechanical sort, as savoring of the quack. Manly self-reliance can never be attained by placing ourselves under the control of others, whether in a physical or "sublimated" body. Not in the school of "mediumship" do we learn better to battle the waves of life as they surge around and over us; only in the development of our own mental powers, under the master hand of soul, recognizing in life a purpose, and unconsciously working out every thought into action, can we ever arrive at a healthy activity of mind. Inspiration, though not of the inferior sort, moved the mind of Matthew Arnold when he wrote these lines:—

"From David's lips this word did roll,
"Thine true and living yet:
No man can save his brother's soul,
Nor pay his brother's debt."

"Alone, self-poised, henceforward man
Must labor, must resign
His all too human creeds, and scan
Simply the way divine."

Is the "spiritual philosophy of the nineteenth century" to become a mechanical one? Is materialism and soulless Sadduceism to be confuted by converting the mind into a spiritual trough, with the sole faculty of "passive receptivity"? Those sparks from the inner hearth where the soul sits enshrined, and known in mortal speech as ideas, talent, genius, are not to be reduced to a phantasm or worshipped as superhuman, but reverently regarded as dim signs of almost infinite possibilities. Inspiration does dwell in the innermost recesses of the soul and is often manifested; especially is it in these words of Carlyle which many might read with profit:—

"Man of Genius! O Mæcenas Twiddledee, hast thou any notion of what a man of genius is? Genius is the 'Inspired gift of God.' It is the clearer presence of God Most High in a man. Dim, potential, in all men—in this man it has become clear, actual. So says John Milton, who ought to be a judge; so answer him the voices, the voices of all ages and all worlds. Wouldst thou commune with such a one? Be his real peer, then: does that lie in thee? Know thyself and thy real and apparent place, and know him and his real and apparent place, and act in some noble conformity with all that. What! the star-fire of the empyrean shall eclipse itself, and illumine magic lanterns to amuse grown children? He, the God-inspired, is to twang harps for thee, and blow through scranell pipes, to soothe thy sated soul with visions of new, still wider Eldorados, Houri-Paradises, richer Lands of Cockaigne! Brother, this is not he; this is a counterfeit, this twanging, jangling, vain, aerial, scranell-piping man. Thou dost well to say with sick Saul, 'It is naught, such harping!' and in sudden rage to grasp thy spear, and try if thou canst pin such a one to the wall. King Saul was mistaken in his man, but thou art right in thine. It is the due of such a one: nail him to the wall, and leave him there. So ought copper shillings to be nailed on counters, copper geniuses on walls, and left there for a sign."

DYER D. LUM.

MANCHESTER, N. H.

AT A PRAYER-MEETING.

Stow, Mass., Oct. 18, 1872.

DEAR INDEX:—

A few days ago I happened to spend half an hour at the noonday prayer-meeting of the Boston Young Men's Christian Association. The occasion was to me an impressive one, and some faces have been hung up in my mental portrait-gallery, and some words have been written on my memory, which will not easily be effaced. That meeting was so impressive that those portraits and those words will always bring back the feelings with which the words filled me, as the men of whom they were born looked pompously around upon the little assemblage and gave them voice. As I entered the room, a young man with closed eyes, evidently the chairman for the day, was discoursing rapidly about the Shepherd who left all his flock to seek the one lost sheep, and about the woman who called her neighbors in to help her find the one piece of silver. As I endeavored to follow the monotone, interesting myself in it by picking out the numerous and lifeless repetitions of—"Oh my Christian friends!" the discourse ended suddenly with an invitation to sing—"Jesus, lover of my soul!" The singing was good, but its tranquillizing effects were soon destroyed by the young chairman's rattling prayer, addressed wholly to Jesus, and concluding with the singular clause, "Amen,—the meeting is now open."

At once a tall, good-looking, well-dressed man of forty-five or fifty years arose and announced that he had not arrived soon enough to hear the opening of the subject for the day, and therefore could not speak upon it; but he felt it his duty to tell some of his experience. "I believe in prayer," he said; "I find great comfort and help in prayer. God answers my prayers. Just remember that! I pray for whatever I want and I get it. I ask God for help in all cases, not only in my spiritual, but in my worldly business, and God helps me. I tell him about my business. If I want money, I go to him just as I would go to Brother — to ask him for ten dollars, and what I pray for always comes. Now there may be some sceptics here who think the money would have come whether I prayed for it or not. All I know is that I prayed and it came—every time. Just remember that. I prayed and it came. Remember that, now! Don't forget it! I prayed and it came!"

The thought occurred to me just then that the speaker ought to join a praying band, or might be enlisted for hospital service when the challenge of Mr. Tyndall's friend is accepted. After a rambling continuation of his remarks to a wearisome extent, he gave place to another individual, who was also a believer in prayer; a somewhat older man, portly and sleek, evidently a man of business and of wealth. He had broken an engagement in order to be in his usual place at that sacred hour, and he didn't know but he should lose five or six hundred dollars by it; but what of that? He had rather be doing his duty, and standing up for Jesus, than to be making thousands of dollars. He intended to stick to his God; that was what he intended to do. When he could please his God so easily, he wasn't going to forsake the prayer-meeting in order to run after a few hundred dollars. People are dying all the time; and perhaps the very time he didn't go to the noon-meeting he might die in the street,—of apoplexy, perhaps,—and he didn't want to hear the angel shout while striking him down: "You forsook your God! You went hunting after money!" He loved to pray for special gifts. He always had something special to pray for. "About a year ago I began to pray for the blessing of entire holiness and sanctification. God heard my prayers, and he gave me what I asked for; but oh! at what a terrible cost. He gave me the blessing of entire holiness and sanctification, but he took my son away from me! I thank God even for that, because through the death of my son came that for which I had prayed."

Thus his words were poured forth some time longer, but what followed was lost to me, for ringing in my mind were the words of that man whom Jesus described as standing in the temple and saying, "God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are!" I felt immeasurably humbled. Here was a man entirely holy, sanctified by the full presence within him of the Holy Spirit! I dared not gaze long upon his countenance, lest the brightness of its glory should destroy my sight. I felt unworthy of being in such a sacred presence, and, quietly picking up my hat, I sadly departed.

Since that day, however, my faith in that man's entire holiness has been dimmed by misgivings. Somehow, as I have mused on the beauty of holiness, visions have come to me of a man walking impatiently up and down, somewhere, at the hour of that meeting, looking at his watch every five minutes till half-past twelve,—an hour or so after the time for the appointed interview,—and then starting for home, carrying upon his mind a heavy item of unfinished business to muse over during the following day of rest; for this day was Saturday. Tell me, dear INDEX, would not God have been glorified and holiness exemplified more fully by the fulfillment of that engagement than by the hour's attendance at prayer-meeting?

F. W. WEBBER.

ARE WE GOVERNED BY LAW?

BY MRS. J. G. KINLEY.

"Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit to his stature? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow: they toil not, neither do they spin; and yet I say unto you that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these."

It has long been satisfactorily demonstrated that the starry system of worlds which adorn the heavenly landscape, and the solid earth beneath our feet, are governed by fixed and unchanging laws; and even the fickle winds which sweep our earth "like the breath of destiny," obey an irresistible fiat. Every movement of the glittering orbs above us, every event on the earth beneath our feet, is the result of law, and proclaims the universe to be governed. The sun goes on in his daily and yearly motions, and the planets measure the circle of their orbits. The moon fails not to remember her phases, and periodically presents her crescent to the earth,—then passing on to full-orbed splendor, coyly retiring with diminishing glory. The restless ocean is ever lashing its rock-ribbed sides, but its tidal waves are held in abeyance. The hard granite hills yield to the elements, and the waters washing their sides enrich the valleys with accumulations of fertile soils. Refreshing rains, gentle dews, and warm sunlight clothe the hills with forests, and the meadows with vegetation. Slowly and surely the work goes on; no confusion exists, no mistakes occur in the world of matter. Can it be that the direction of human affairs is left either to chance, or special Providence, or the caprice of man?

Intellectual, moral, and spiritual development and culture seem to be Nature's aim in regard to man; and every succeeding generation makes new discoveries of regularity in unexplored regions of seeming confusion, tracing human events to preceding causes. As far as we are cognizant of the history of our globe and its inhabitants, we find all to be fashioned by a Power we cannot understand; who controls and directs without consulting our wishes, or being governed by our wills. "That when we perform an action, we perform it in consequence of some motive or motives; that these motives are the result of antecedents, and that therefore, were we acquainted with the whole of the antecedents, and with all the laws of their movements, we could with unerring certainty predict the whole of their immediate results."

That the human mind obeys the laws of its own existence admits of no doubt. I can see no distinction between the laws controlling mind and those controlling matter. The chain lacks no link. The same system of laws which causes the buds to swell into bloom under a warm sun and genial showers, makes individuals go to war under certain circumstances, or conditions, contract marriages under others, and commit murder under still other conditions. One might as well say that the earth need not have stored away the coal in the carboniferous era, as to say that certain types of men need not commit murder, or enter into the marriage relation. A law of necessity governs these things, which they did not create, neither can they resist.

Popular theology declares that mankind are forever going astray from God, who is constantly reaching out an imploring hand, begging his stiff-necked and rebellious children to return to him, ere they reach the fiery doom prepared for the devil and his angels.

Reason tells us that "God is no respecter of persons," and that the fate of one man will be the fate of all. If one man finds an endless hell, then will all men gravitate to the same locality. Fashioned by a power he cannot see, man is moving helplessly on over the sea of life to an unknown shore; and he is living in a delusion, when he believes that his acts are determined by his capricious volition. He may encounter unforeseen calamities, but his absolute course can never be backward. It is ever onward and upward, though death and decay attend his steps. The human race is never at rest; change is written with the pen of Fate upon every earthly thing. Events are forever occurring from preceding events, and ideas springing from those that have gone before, forming a chain of cause and effect, immutable as God. The man who looks from the narrow valley, bounded by mountains whose tops reach the clouds, sees only a small landscape, but he who scales the mountain's dizzy heights overlooks the world. He can trace the tinkling brooklets to their sources, and follow them on their meandering way to the sea. So, he who looks through theological eyes, sees but a narrowly bounded horizon and a tiny speck of human life. But he who calmly walks with science, using fearlessly his God-given reason, clasps hands with deity and passes from the contemplation of the finite to the necessary and eternal.

As it took ages of preparation to make the earth suitable for man's habitation, so it must take years of development and growth to make man's brain of suitable texture to receive and retain grand and liberal thoughts. When he outgrows the age of faith, he will enter upon the era of reason, and then old things will pass away, and he will enter upon a more real life. Stratum after stratum made the floors of our earth, ere the mammals could live, but preceding ages always sent their prophets foretelling the future. Marapials went before the Rodents, the Herbivora before the Carnivora, the Carnivora before the Quadrumana, who heralded man.

'Tis thus with man. Constantly receding, the old gives place to the new, and even the human mind reaches out after the infinite. The dogmas of the past no longer satisfy, and one by one their fossil remains are buried under the accumulations of the present. Whether we desire it or not, we are obliged to move. Compelled by a law of necessity we cannot resist, we follow out the plan of the Divine Architect who cannot be foiled in any of his designs. It may be gratifying to human vanity to feel that Divine Wisdom can be, and often is, moved by weak petitions, but reason sees only disaster if such a thing were even possible. The direction of the universe in such fickle hands would not command our confidence, or insure a safe continuance of Nature's laws. We only feel safe and happy when we believe there is a Power at the helm, who is capable of managing his own affairs in his own way.

A METAPHYSICAL VIEW.—An Arkansas local colloquizes thus: "Some of our exchanges are publishing as a curious item a statement to the effect that a horse in Iowa pulled the plug out of a bung-hole of a barrel. We do not see anything extraordinary in the occurrence. Now, if the horse had pulled the barrel out of the bung-hole and slaked his thirst with the plug, or if the barrel had pulled the bung-hole out of the plug and slaked its thirst with the horse, or if the plug had pulled the horse out of the barrel and slaked its thirst with the bung-hole, or if the bung-hole had pulled the thirst out of the horse and slaked the plug with the barrel, or if the barrel had pulled the horse out of the bung-hole and plugged its thirst with a slake, it might be worth while to make some fuss over it."

A Pekin (Ill.) woman was asked by the preacher if her husband feared the Lord. She replied: "Fear him? Why, bless you, he is so 'feared of him that he never goes out of the house on Sunday without taking his gun along."

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S NEW BOOK.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

CONTENTS.—I. Tendencies; II. God; III. Bible; IV. Christ; V. Atonement; VI. Power of Moral Inspiration; VII. Providence; VIII. Moral Ideal; IX. Immortality; X. Education of Conscience; XI. The Soul of Good in Evil; XII. The Soul of Truth in Error.

One vol., 12 mo. $1.50. Sent free on receipt of price.
DAVID G. FRANCIS, Publisher,
17 Astor Place, New York.

Geo. B. Brown,
Late Cashier Toledo
Savings Institution.

WM. A. FAUNCE,
Late with Henry B.
Stebbins.

BROWN & FAUNCE,

BOOKSELLERS.

STATIONERS.

AND DEALERS IN

Wall and Window Papers,

(Successors to Henry B. Stebbins.)

115 SUMMIT STREET, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Keep constantly on hand a fine stock of standard and current literature embracing books upon Science, Art, and Religion, and are in receipt of new books from publishers as fast as issued. Books sent by mail post paid on receipt of publishers price, and promptly ordered when not in stock. Out-of-date and rare books furnished when procurable in this country or in England. Orders by mail solicited.

WANTED

BOOK AGENTS

FOR THE

GREAT INDUSTRIES

OF THE UNITED STATES;

AN HISTORICAL SUMMARY OF THE ORIGIN, GROWTH,
AND PERFECTION OF THE CHIEF INDUSTRIAL ARTS OF THIS COUNTRY.

1,300 PAGES AND 500 ENGRAVINGS.

Written by 20 Eminent Authors, including

JOHN B. GOUGH, LEON CASE, EDWARD HOWLAND,

JOSEPH LYMAN, Rev. E. EDWIN HALL, HORACE

GREGORY, PHILIP RIPLEY,

ALBERT BRISBANE, F. B. PERKINS, Etc., Etc.

This work is a complete history of all branches of industry, processes of manufacture, etc., in all ages. It is a complete encyclopedia of arts and manufactures, and is the most entertaining and valuable work of information on subjects of general interest ever offered to the public. It is adapted to the wants of the Merchant, Manufacturer, Mechanic, Farmer, Student, and Inventor, and sells to both old and young of all classes. The book is sold by agents, who are making large sales in all parts of the country. It is offered at the low price of $1.50, and is the cheapest book ever sold by subscription. No family should be without a copy. We want Agents in every town of the United States, and no Agent can fail to do well with this book. Our terms are liberal. We give our agents the exclusive right of territory. One of our agents sold 133 copies in eight days; another sold 368 in two weeks. Our agent in Hartford sold 397 in one week. Specimens of the work sent to agents on receipt of stamp. For circulars and terms to agents address the publishers,

J. B. MURR & HYDE, Hartford, Conn.,
CHICAGO, ILL., or CINCINNATI, OHIO.

A copy of the above really valuable book will be mailed postpaid to any one who shall send $15.00, together with the names of FIVE NEW subscribers, to
"THE INDEX, DRAWER 22, TOLEDO, OHIO."

Friends of the Index!

Please send us immediately the name and address of every Radical Bookseller and Newsmen you may know of; also the address of every editor and paper likely to give aid and comfort to our enterprise; and oblige ASA E. BUTTS, Agent of THE INDEX.

Address

THE INDEX, DRAWER 22, TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE RADICAL.

A few odd volumes, bound in cloth, for sale at two dollars ($2) per vol. Sent post paid.

Address

SYDNEY H. MORSE,

22 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

BOUND INDEX FOR 1871.—Complete files of THE INDEX for 1871, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 75 cents postage, or sent by express if the postage is not prepaid by the purchaser. Only a limited number can be furnished.

THE KEARNEY.—A limited number of Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 will be sent postpaid—the four numbers for 50 cents, Nos. 1, 2, and 3 for 40 cents, Nos. 1 and 2 for 30 cents, No. 1 for 20 cents. What remains of this series are reserved for binding. St. Louis Herald says: "The boldest heretic of today." The Independent says: "The most pronounced radical in the land." The Chicago Post says: "Equal to the utterances of Thimothy Parker." Address THE KEARNEY, Winnetka, Ill., where the numbers for sale remain. [136-17]

$5 to $30 per day! Are you wanted? All classes on working people, 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., daily, at 1000 1/2 St. Louis, Mo. Make money at work! Particulars on application to J. F. RUGGLES, Bronson, Mich.

THE INDEX.

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. ABBOT, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents concepts of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution, by Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD, opposes the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by PARKER PILLSBURY, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. ABBOT. Third Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from 5 to 100 copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN and F. E. ABBOT. PRICE—10 cents; 12 copies, $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. NEWMAN, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. PRICE—5 cents; 12 copies, 50 cents.

Address,

THE INDEX,

Drawer 22, Toledo, Ohio.

"THE CLERGY

A SOURCE OF DANGER TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE."

Every Liberal should read this book. Price $1.75, postage free. Send for a copy. Address W. F. Jamieson, 138 & 141 Morgan St., Chicago, Ill. Agents wanted in every city, town, and village in the American Union.

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy,

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY IN ST. LOUIS, MO.

It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of Speculative Philosophy in all its departments.

Terms of Subscription.

Two dollars per volume; single number, 50 cents. Vols. I. and II., bound in one volume in muslin, will be sent post-paid by mail for $5.00.
Vol. III., Vol. IV., and Vol. V. in muslin, $3.00 each.

All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor,

WM. T. HARRIS,

110-16100w.

Box 222, St. Louis, Mo.

Back Numbers of the Index!

FOR 1870 AND 1871.

IT is no longer possible to furnish a complete file of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address at

Twenty-five Cents a Dozen!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

Address

THE INDEX,

Toledo, Ohio.

Guns for the People.

Breach-Loading Double Guns, $40 to $300. Double-Barrel 500 Grns. $25 to $150. Single Guns, $25 to $30. Breach-loading and Repeating Rifles, $20 to $100. Revolvers, $6 to $25. Pistols, $3 to $5. Gun material, fixtures and assortment of every kind very cheap. SEND STAMP for Large Illustrated and Descriptive Price-List to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Samuel Johnson's Work On India.

Sent on receipt of price.—$5.00.

Address

S. H. MORSE.

Send to same address for Catalogue of other scientific and religious works.

FOR ENGLISH AND AMERICAN BOOKS of all kinds, send to J. F. RUGGLES, Bronson, Mich. [13100w]

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 142 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 25 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public attention to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of New York City.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. DALLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHERNEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Weston upon St. Mary.
Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.

ASA E. BUTTS is Advertising Agent for the Index Association. All letters to him on business matters, relative to the paper, should be addressed—"THE INDEX, Drawer 22, Toledo, Ohio."

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription. Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months in trial.

Address

THE INDEX,
Drawer 22, Toledo, Ohio.

New Tracts!

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition.

FIRST SERIES.....No. 1 to No. 2

SECOND SERIES.....No. 21 to No. 22

Either Series, 30 Cents; Both, 50 Cents.

Address

CHAS. E. WHIPPLE,

[25-38]

19 PINE STREET, BOSTON.

Free Religious Association.

The Report in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1871, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, WM. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass. It contains essays by John W. Chadwick, on "LIBERTY AND THE CHURCH IN AMERICA;" by C. D. B. Mills, on the question, "DOES RELIGION REPRESENT A PERMANENT SENTIMENT OF THE HUMAN MIND, OR IS IT A PERISHABLE SUPERSTITION?" and by O. B. Frothingham, on "THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY;" together with the Report of the Executive Committee, and addresses and remarks by Dr. Bartol, A. B. Alcott, Lucretia Mott, Celia Burleigh, Horace Sager, Alexander Loos, and others. Price, 35 cents; in packages of five or more, 25 cents each.

[144 tr]

WM. J. POTTER,

Secretary.

HALL'S
MAGIC SHADE FIXTURES!

An ingenious arrangement by which a Shade may be rolled down from the top, or raised from the bottom of the window, or both, as may be desired; thus securing PERFECT VENTILATION, GOOD LIGHT, and at the same time COMPLETE PRIVACY in the room.

They are an admirable and cheap substitute for Inside Blinds.

Are easily attached to Shades now in use. Are especially adapted for Office and Store Windows.

For sale by dealers in shades generally.

MANUFACTURED BY THE

CHICAGO CURTAIN FIXTURE COMPANY,

145 SOUTH CLINTON ST., CHICAGO, ILL.

[13717]

F. J. SCOTT,

J. H. STOPPLET

ARCHITECTS,

78 MADISON STREET (Near Boody House), TOLEDO.
[130-181]

DAVID G. FRANCIS.

DEALER IN

NEW AND OLD BOOKS,

17 Astor Place, and 140 8th St., New York.

Priced catalogues of books in stock, issued from time to time, will be forwarded free to any address.

THE series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 10) will be sent postpaid on receipt of sixty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word."); "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. BRADFORD; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. ABBOT. This series contains the aggregate of two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter. Address THE INDEX, Drawer 22, Toledo, Ohio.

Digitized by Google

The Index.

Three Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, DECEMBER 28, 1872.

WHOLE No. 157.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
ABRAHAM WALTER STEVENS, Associate Editor.

OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, REV. CHARLES VOTAW (England), PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), REV. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

Jacob's Ladder.

READ TO THE UNITARIAN SOCIETY OF DOVER, N. H., FEBRUARY 10, 1867.

BY FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

"Surely the Lord is in this place, and I know it not."
GEN. XXVIII: 16.

Let that stand as the confession of humanity, the epitome of human experience. Jacob spoke for his race, as every one does who speaks from his heart.

Men fence off a bit of what they call "hallowed ground," put up a church on it, and remember that God is there. But is he nowhere else as well? Must this broad soil which drinks so gratefully the rains and sunshine of heaven concentrate all its sacredness in the churchyard, and elsewhere lie un sanctified?

"What's hallowed ground? 'Tis what gives birth
To sacred thoughts in souls of worth:
Peace, Independence, Truth! go forth
Earth's compass round,
And your high priesthood shall make earth
All hallowed ground."

Men divide the unbroken years into days, setting apart one-seventh of them as "Sabbaths," and remembering that these are holy. You know the hymn beginning—

"This is the day the Lord hath made;
O Earth, rejoice and sing!"

But who made the other six days? If days are "made" at all, was it not also the Lord? The awful stretch of time from everlasting to everlasting is but one long day which God has blessed.

Nor is it only to places and times that men limit God. In the long course of history, they recognize his hand at intervals, here and there, in Egypt or Judaea, but see nothing of him in the current events of to-day. Was he in the advent of Moses and of Jesus? Yes, verily he was; and quite as much in the advent of Lincoln and of Grant. In the heavy footfalls of 1,200,000,000 of the human race, marching slowly in this very hour to a higher civilization than the world has yet known, I hear the rhythmic tread of God. In the public calamities which have brought this mighty nation of America to the establishment of universal freedom, and which must at last bring about the full enfranchisement of white and black, male and female, on the broad basis, not of manhood suffrage, but of humanity suffrage,—in all this I behold the presence of God more distinctly than in any event of so-called "sacred history." Why, friends, is not all history sacred? Is there not in all ages the same resistless march of the Divine Purpose and Power? Believe me, there is no such thing as what Christian unbelievers call "profane history." The Perfect Providence controls the whole vast sweep of human destiny, and is forever master of the situation. If we ever fear for the future of our beloved country, or of the human race, let us fall back on the old confession:—"Surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not."

Men limit God's presence quite as much in their own experience as in space, time, or history. They believe that he was present at their birth, as Creator; at their "conversion," if they have joined the church; and perhaps in a few great crises or escapes from deadly peril. They remember him in the rare and great events of life, but in the tame current of everyday pursuits they see nothing of him. It is not that they deny his presence, but simply become insensible, unconscious, blind to it. If you had asked Jacob, when he laid his head on that stony pillow at night, if he believed that God was there with him in the darkness, he would have answered you with a surprised and perhaps indignant—"Yes! Of course I do. What a question to ask!" In his busy schemes to get rich, he had simply forgotten God; and forgetfulness of God is the saddest possible ignorance of him. Better be a poor naked African, worshipping a crocodile or fetish, and unblest in all his empty life with one sweet thought of the Divine Love in and over him, than a respectable, prosperous, selfish "Christian," whose remembrance of God wakes up out of its slumbers for perhaps an hour on Sunday, and four or five minutes at the beginning or end of the day. There are men who actually seem to believe that they lay the Almighty under an obligation, confer quite a favor on him in fact, by lending to the church services the sanction of their aristocratic presence. In their pride and folly, they fancy they pay a compliment to him by occupying once a week a pew in some fashionable church, while they occupy six times a week a pew in the church of Mammon.

In how many ways do we excel Jacob in this easy art of forgetting God! Jacob was no worse than the rest of us. He lay down to repose in a holy place, and knew it not; God had hallowed the spot where he lay, as he hallows all spots, and to Jacob it was mere dust of the desert. How often do we, in the journey of life, pillow our heads on hard, rough stones, which, if we truly knew them, would be to us as the all-supporting arm of God! We are as unconscious of the Benignity that embraces us as the new-born infant on its mother's breast; or even as this sordid-minded Jacob. Not till we learn to look on every foot of life's pathway as part of the sacred pavement of God's grand cathedral, and on life's pathway itself as but a side-aisle beneath its vast and over-arching dome, shall we travel with the remembrance of God as the ever-living and ever-blessing Goodness.

Many thoughts crowd upon me as I read this quaint and beautiful story of Jacob's Ladder. I am tempted somewhat to change it. The fugitive patriarch falls asleep and finds heaven and earth united, angels ascending and descending, God speaking to him in words of encouragement and love: that, as the story stands, is the Dream, the Illusion. He wakes, and at first is struck with terror; but, recovering from this, he begins to speculate in his devotions, tries to drive a hard bargain with the Lord, promises that he will worship him as his God in return for fixed wages in bread and clothes, and offers to pay back again, as a bribe for Divine favors, one-tenth of all he shall receive! "If God will be with me," he says, "and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat and raiment to put on, so that I come to my father's house in peace, then shall the Lord be my God; and this stone which I have set up for a pillar shall be God's house; and of all that thou shalt give me, I will surely give the tenth unto thee." That is the Fact after the Dream, the Reality. But as I place the Dream and the Reality side by side, I would fain shift the names; I would fain see in the beautiful vision the greatest and most precious of all realities; in the prayer after the vision a foul and ugly and deceitful nightmare. Let me believe in the truth poetically symbolized by the angels and the ladder and the divine voice from on high; and let me disbelieve utterly in the base, mean, contemptible spirit that, after the unveiling of the heavens, could shrewdly stipulate first of all for a fat salary in bread and butter. Let the vision be real, and the reality visionary. Let us refuse to credit the story of Jacob's prayer, and concede it to be quite impossible that one to whom so beautiful a vision should come could be guilty of trading on it, and squeezing out of it a little profit to add to his business capital. There is no meaner man mentioned in the whole Bible than Jacob; yet I would gladly believe that even he, after experiences so high, was incapable of such brazen-faced impudence and sharp practice. So I look on the dream as more real than the dark, ugly realities that followed it; I think Jacob less wakeful when he waked than when he slept. He saw more and deeper with his shut than with his open eyes.

And yet how significant a lesson is contained in Jacob's spiritual deadness! He had just cheated his poor, blind father out of the first-born's blessing, and swindled his brave, frank-hearted brother Esau out of his inheritance; he was on his way to swindle and cheat his uncle Laban out of his cattle, and play the hypocrite and coward even worse than before. How could such a wretch receive a pure illumination from God? Eager to get gain out of every one he could cheat, Jacob at once shrewdly hastened to improve the unexpected chance to fill his pockets, and to take advantage even of Providence. His avarice, not his love or aspiration, was stirred by the divine vision; and he forthwith with low cunning put up his disgusting plea for bread and raiment,—with unparalleled liberality promised God a commission of ten per cent. on all that God himself should bestow! How true to human nature the story is, after all! Fill a man's soul with selfishness, and God himself cannot speak so plainly as to be understood. Heaven's holiest teachings are trampled into the mud by his swinish feet. We disable ourselves from hearing or understanding divine truth by our own selfishness. Though the skies be thrown open to our gaze, and the splendor of the golden streets revealed, we do but calculate the value of the gold at the last quotations of the money-market, and cypher out its equivalent in greenbacks. Deaf to the words and blind to the beauty of the heavenly hosts, our selfishness makes us unable to receive the great lessons of the vision. It is a grave thought. Only the pure in heart shall see God, hear his voice, comprehend his truth. The selfish heart builds up a wall that nothing can batter down again between itself and nobleness. And in Jacob's melancholy awakening, I see the universal punishment of a sordid spirit. What knew he of the meaning of his dream? As little as a dog knows of the loveliness of the landscape he stupidly looks at. The dog scents only the rabbit in the bushes, dashes into the thicket with a hungry howl, and leaves his master to admire the beautiful scene. So Jacob scented only the chance for increased rations, and left all reverence for the deep, beautiful truths of his vision to men that have souls.

Leave Jacob to his bargaining. Let us see if we cannot discover some of these truths. Free communion between the finite and the Infinite,—that is the key to Jacob's dream. To accept its oriental imagery, it teaches that, wherever man may lay his weary head, the ladder's foot is planted in his soul, while its top touches the throne of God. Up and down its golden rounds shining feet pass forever and forever; and over all the moving throng comes the tender voice of him who speaks to every listening ear. Free communion between man and God,—that is the secret of the vision. Our contrite prayers, our grateful thanks, our reverent adorations, our innocent rejoicings, our untold griefs, our deathless aspirations, all these are angels, ascending the long stairway and bearing skyward the worship of a childlike heart. And blessings without number descend with angelic feet in answer to these messengers from human hearts. Every barrier destroyed between the Human and the Divine, how fleetly shall thought mount up to Infinite Purity, and return laden with divinest benedictions!

The ascending angels are Aspiration, the descending angels are Inspiration. They are the inflow of ever-renewed divine life to the soul, and the opening of the soul to receive it. Without this mysterious, yes, this mystical commingling of God with the human spirit, there can be no deep and true worship. Our thoughts about God are one thing; our direct communion with him is quite another. The divine spirit blends with the human spirit beneath the region of consciousness, and we know it best by the profounder upsurging of our love and faith. The very aspirations which rise to God and return to us as his inspirations spring from a fountain which only he unseals and prompts to motion.

At sea, two mighty and opposing winds sometimes encounter each other, and, whirling round with vast rapidity, begin to form a column of water rising from the ocean's surface; at the same moment, the revolving winds catch the overhanging clouds in their vortex, and draw down a corresponding column from above. The two columns lengthen until they meet in one and form a water-spout, through whose hollow centre electric currents shoot with constant fires. Shall we say that somewhat thus aspiration meets inspiration, and creates a conscious unity with God which is the very life of the soul? The vision of Jacob is only another expression of a great truth, for which all expressions are poor and meagre,—the truth in which we rest with inward peace when our hearts are pure and our spiritual eyes are unobscured,—the truth of God's presence in the soul of man. Was not the vision more true and real than Jacob's terrified awakening and selfish prayer? Have not the vision and the reality by some fatuity exchanged names, and is there not more truth, after all, in the fiction of his sleep than in the facts that followed?

How often do we encounter this mercantile idea of prayer! Instead of the free, spontaneous, uncalculating outgush of the soul towards its source, it is made the cool and business-like enumeration of particular favors men have to beg. In return for so many words, they seem to expect so much pleasure or money or worldly success. Is it not wiser to remember the great laws of God which never change for human importunity, and seek rather to submit our desires to the eternal wisdom we surely cannot improve? The arrogant dictation, the irreverent intermeddling, the repulsive particularity, which so often strike our ear in listening to prayer, are empty of all genuine religion. The egotistic selfishness of Jacob, though it took the form of petition to God, had nothing in it that was devout. Such prayers leave the soul more out of harmony with him than it was before. They are too gross and heavy to climb the Ladder, and tumble back again to earth.

It is to the head pillowed on stones that the divinest visions come. When we are summoned to pass through the wilderness, and make our couch in solitude under the wide canopy of the skies,—when perhaps our limbs are weary with the toil of the journey, chilled with the biting night-air, and stiffened by the hardships they endure,—the gates of glory are trembling on their hinges, and the vision is near at hand. In the sadness of a lonely and sorrowful life, the rough desert may become a true "Beth-el," a true "house of God;" the Ladder is thronged with shining forms, and many and precious are the truths they bring. Wherever a noble spirit stands steadfastly at its post, doing and bearing all things with quiet heroism, even though it seems defenceless in a wild storm of distress, the air swarms with messengers of mercy and consolation. The wind that howls through the wilderness becomes a whisper of peace from on high; the jagged edges of the rocks that pillow the wanderer's tired head become soft as down and smooth as silken cushions; and through the gateway of sleep visions descend that are no mocking dreams, but high and divine realities. No faithful human soul passes through any night, dark as it may be, without finding the darkness illumined with divine and unexpected compensations. When the night is gone and the day dawns, it awakes and exclaims: "Surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not."

A correspondent of the Christian World says: "The progress of Roman Catholicism in England within the last thirty years is almost incredible. From 1841 to 1871 the population of England and Wales increased a trifle over 40 per cent. But in less time, viz., from 1842 to 1871, Popery in England and Wales has increased, its chapels nearly 100 per cent., its priests nearly 150 per cent., its convents nearly 1,000 per cent., and its monasteries more than 1,700 per cent. For this increase Romanism is indebted to the members of the 'Society of Jesus,' and especially to those members of that order who officiate as clergymen of the Established Church of this land."

A worthy deacon gave notice at a prayer-meeting the other night of a church-meeting that was to be held immediately after, and unconsciously added, "There is no objection to the female brethren remaining." This reminds us of a clergyman who told in his sermon last Sunday of a very affecting scene, where "there wasn't a dry tear in the house."

MR. VOYSEY ON THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

[From the Midland Free Press, England.]

On Monday evening, the Rev. Mr. Voysey gave a lecture in the Temperance Hall; subject, "The Church of England—shall it be disestablished or reformed?" The audience was select, but not numerous. The chair was taken by W. Kempson, Esq., who briefly introduced the lecturer.

Mr. Voysey said that in the course of his lecture he might probably say very offensive things; it was a misfortune when attacking existing evils that such was invariably the case, but it was far from his thoughts to give intentional offence to any one. A common feeling had brought them all there that night; not a very exalted one perhaps, but one which under the present state of things was quite justifiable. They were not on very good terms with the Church of England—not only was this the case with Nonconformists, but likewise with Churchmen themselves. The Orthodox Dissenter and the Ritualist wanted to save the Church, but with very different views. History had told them this, that priests could only be kept down by the arm of civil law. Let them beware of priests, and above all of an alliance between them and those who had hitherto been at enmity with them. The Low and the Broad Church both had a grudge against the Old Lady; they did not, however, carry their complaints to the verge of disaffection. The Prayer-book likewise was a fruitful source of contention. The Athanasian Creed was the great stumbling-block—the ugly, decayed tooth, that needed immediate extraction. That creed had been characterized as an imposture; and it was, notwithstanding, a curious fact that not all the Queen's Counsellors could give this humpty-dumpty the necessary push. Why did not the bishops attempt to get rid of it? Because they well knew if they did so it would only be the beginning of the disappearance of the Thirty-Nine Articles together. There were three propositions as to what was to be done with the Church, on which he would briefly dilate. 1. To disestablish the Church, only retaining the endowment wholly or in part. 2. To disestablish and disendow the Church. 3. To reform the Church, without disestablishment or disendowment. The first of these propositions would, in his opinion, be the worst of the three to adopt. The Church, left to herself, would thrust out neck and crop every honest preacher who should hazard an opinion of his own that was not in strict harmony with the Thirty-Nine Articles; or, at all events, she would make their position much too hot for them to remain within her pale. Disestablishment plus endowment would be a great calamity to the Dissenter, High Churchism being at deadly enmity with Nonconformity. In the case of disestablishment and disendowment, vested interests in this country must be held sacred. With due regard to vested interests, the Church might be pulled down stone by stone. The voluntary principle only answered in large towns; in the country voluntarism was a dead letter. (The speaker here gave a most touching description of a country parish, and the relations existing between pastor and people.) With reference to the third proposition—that the Church be reformed without disestablishment or disendowment—he considered this the most important of the three. The present dead-lock was due to divisions and strifes. If the Church was what it ought to be there would be no cause for dissent. If they would not like other people to thrust their opinions upon them, why should they thrust their views upon other people? The first practical proposition he would make was, the Disestablishment of the Thirty-Nine Articles. If people were afraid of heresy, they evidently had very little confidence in the articles of their own faith. The most successful condition for carrying home truth to the hearer was the knowledge that the speaker enjoyed perfect liberty of speech. Such was not the case in the Church of England, and every Nonconformist minister knew how much worse his condition was. After expatiating at some length upon prayers and liturgies, the reverend gentleman said that the Act of Uniformity was a disgrace, that it failed to secure uniformity, and that it was the fatal cancer from which the Church of England would never recover except by the free use of the operator's knife. That Act must be repealed. The great advantage of the measure he proposed was, that it would be more likely than any other at the present time to secure the sanction of the legislature. Such men as the Rev. James Martineau had been precluded from preaching even in the most obscure parish, when in reality he might wear a bishop's mitre. Christianity was a reproach and a byword when men were debarred from religious liberty, equality, and fraternity. The lecturer then cited a number of objections that would be sure to be raised against the abolition of doctrinal tests. First, the question would be, How could a Church exist without a creed? "Church" was a word of cruel ambiguity. If by Church was meant a community which could boast of harmony in action, constitution, and doctrine, there never was such a Church, from the time of Christ downwards. Doctrine depended upon the living human thought, not upon lifeless creeds. The cry of "Church" was silly. Then, again, the dread of what would become of the Prayer-book in this impious reform, would be another strong objection. There were people who considered the Prayer-book almost equal, or at all events next in importance, to the Bible. If it deserved such a position, they need have no fear for the Prayer-book; and if the Prayer-book was not to be depended upon, the sooner it was out of the way the better. It would further be contended that this reform would open the door to secularism and atheism. The State was entirely helpless in stifling thought, and no harmony could ever be arrived at in the Church while it favored one creed more than another. England was too far advanced on the road to liberty and truth ever to turn back again to sacerdotalism. They would have to fight not with men, but with opinions. If they had no Church left, then they should have something better; he did not care what they called it—National Soup-kitchen for the Nourishment of the Mind, if they liked.

The reverend gentleman, who had been warmly received throughout his lecture, sat down amidst loud plaudits.

The Chairman, in the course of a few supplementary remarks, stated that there was a strong determination among all classes to obtain religious equality.

The Rev. A. F. Macdonald, M. A., moved a vote of thanks to the Rev. C. Voysey, for his able, thoughtful, well-considered, and highly-suggestive lecture; and he trusted the audience would well weigh the sentiments therein expressed. The motion was seconded by Mr. J. Riley, who expressed a hope that the lecture might soon be published, so that every one could read and study it for himself. The resolution was carried by acclamation, and after a suitable acknowledgment by Mr. Voysey, the meeting separated.

HEATHEN POETRY.

[From the Pall Mall Gazette.]

Recent regrets as to the temptations of heathenism seem to have been anticipated in India itself, for we find in the Friend of India, of July 18, half a dozen verses from translations of Tamil poetry, which are confessed to be "beautiful,"—the quaint comment being added: "The above, we regret to say, are all heathen." The extracts thus referred to were taken from two papers on "Tamil Popular Poetry," contributed to two recent numbers of the Indian Antiquary (Bombay) by Mr. Cardwell, of Madras, wherein the writer undertakes to discuss the characteristics of Tamil poetry and to prove by ample illustration that "Tamil popular poetry contains gems of art of which any European language might be proud." Here is a specimen of a popular Tamil poet. The original text is given in the Antiquary, and these translations, though rhymed, are asserted by one of the most eminent Tamil scholars to be "almost absolutely accurate."

"THE SHEPHERD OF THE WORLDS."

[A detached piece from the poems of Sivavakkiyar.]

"How many various flowers
Did I in bygone hours
Call for the god, and in his honor strew!
In vain how many a prayer
I breathed into the air.
And made, with many forms, obeisance due.
"Beating my breast, aloud
How oft I called the crowd
To drag the village car. How oft I strayed
In manhood's prime to lave
Sunward the dawning wave,
And circling Siva's fancies my homage paid.
"But they—the true wise—
Who know and realize
Where dwells the SHEPHERD OF THE WORLDS, will ne'er
To any visible shrine,
As if it were divine,
Deign to raise hands of worship or of prayer."

Such is the tone of the most popular of Tamil poets against what is called gross idolatry, not dissimilar to some phases of devotion nearer home; such is a philosophy popular among the peasantry of India and altogether undervalued from what is called Western civilization.

From about thirty stanzas by the same poet, given in Tamil and English, by Mr. Cardwell, we select the following three, having a like theme with the preceding:—

"Fools! with continual searching,

"The god," the rods," ye cry;

Even the way ye know not

To seek for them whereby.

Tell me, is it religion

To say: 'The gods are three'?

To attain to God, within you

Your search for him must be.

"The feathered ass, becomes it

A swan if God's adored?

Ye sin all fools, can Siva

Become the one true Lord?

A wholly spiritual object

To the Heathenfolk ye stunts;

The Original, the Endless,

Whom no mind understands!

"Not Vishnu, Brahma, Siva,

In the beyond he be;

Nor black, nor white, nor ruddy

This Source of things that be.

Not great is he, not little,

Not female and not male;

But stands far, far, and far beyond

All beings' utmost pale."

And also the two following, on religious symbol-tem—a subject the solution of which seems to be quite as earnestly and intelligently aimed at and as hopelessly missed by the Indian as by the European intellect. To devotees thus:—

"How many your devotees!
Altho' ye mortals
Your bodies, go through mantras,
To temple-choulties his,
Ye will not know The Splendor
Who bath in space his seat;
They with minds cleared can only
Reach the true Siva's feet.

"My thoughts are flowers and ashes,
In my breast's face enshrouded;
My breath, too, is therein it
A linga unconfined;
My senses, too, like incense
Hiss and like bright lamps shine;
There, too, my soul leaps ever
A dancing-god divine."

Mr. Cardwell says the drift of this last stanza, which, in his opinion, is one of the finest ever written by Sivavakkiyar, is as follows: "You popular Hindus have your temples; you have your flowers and sacred ashes; you have your phallus or emblem of divine creative power; you have your incense and lamps, and you have your divine dancer, Siva. I, too, have my flowers and ashes; but they are of the mind. I, too, have my linga; but it is my breath or spirit. I, too, have my incense and lamps; but they are my five senses. And I, too, have my deity, leaping in divine sport within me; but that is my soul. In a word, mine is the true spiritual worship."

From the "lamentations" of the same poet we select the English version of the second half:—

"When, ah! when
Will the bliss time of bliss attained arrive,
When I annihilate these senses five,
Suppress my pride and my ill being steep
In that existence which is sleepless sleep?"

"When, ah! when,
Cleaving through all this birth's illusious vain,
Shall I to my last spiritual state attain?"

"When, ah! when,
Burning the Shastras, deeming the Vedas four
More lies, shall I the Mystery explore,
And perfect bliss attain for evermore?"

"When, ah! when,
Laying aside, bound fast, the Shastras' lore,
Wholly distraught, too, the Vedas four,
Shall I the Mystery know and grieve no more?"

"When, ah! when,
Though I the Vedas four may hoarsely shout,
Too secret of the Heavens shall I find out?"

"When, ah! when
Shall this poor soul within this body set,
Disguised like man within a net,
Find the True Priest, and offer, as is meet,
Perpetual homage to his sacred feet?"

"When, ah! when
Will all my carnal lusts have utter end;
And I, with eyelids dropt, to Heaven ascend,
And with God's being my own being blend?"

From various writings of Pattanattu Pillai, "characterized more by melodious verblage than by striking thought, Mr. Cardwell gives a dozen stanzas, of which the following is the English version of the first couple. The first is a meditation on death, and runs thus:—

"When dead my mother scorns me, saying, 'But a corpse
I be.'
My gold-bought wife with weeping cries out, 'Depart from me.'
My sons, my pyre encircling, their wonted pots let fall;
There is no love but Thy love, O Thou that ownest all!"

Another stanza by the same writer contrasts the vulgar idolatry with the omnipresence of Siva:—

"In speech and its conclusion and in the Vedas too;
In darkness and in Heaven's stainless expanse of blue;
In hearts of true ascetics and in each loving mind,
The Lord's unbounded presence ye certainly may find;
But how in stone and copper can ye the god describe
Who in his forehead beareth the terrible one eye?"

For seven centuries the Rāmāyana of Kamban has been the folk song of Southern India, alike popular in the bazaar, among the peasantry of the village, and at the social gatherings of the great. It was in elaborately studied imitation of this national "heathen" epic (which he wished to supplant among native Christians) that Beschi produced his "Tembavani," relating in his fashion the Gospel narrative. To illustrate the general character of these translations, we add one stanza from this poem. "It is," says Mr. Cardwell, "impossible in any translation to reproduce the spirit and melody of the original stanza. Even those who have studied Tamil deeply must be struck with the remarkable verbal structure of these eight lines." The measure in which they are written is common in Tamil popular verse. In the original, as given in Romanized form, the first word of the first, third, fifth, and seventh lines are perfect rhymes to the Tamilian ear; the second and last words in all these lines are identical; the first words of the first two lines form a perfect rhyme; the verse has other peculiar harmonies, and is, says Mr. Cardwell, the most famous verse in a famous poem:—

"Whist! Thee, with tongues of splendor, the orbs of Heaven praise;
Whist! gems to Thee their voices, with tongues of brilliance, raise;
Whist! unto Thee wood-warblers, with tongues of joyance,
sing;
Whist! wood-flowers Thy sweet praises from tongues of fragrance fling;
Whist! Thee, with tongues of clearness, the water-floods applaud;
Thus, day by day, from all things dost Thou receive not lead?
Wilt Thou not deign to suffer the tongue I thou gavest me—
Though I be dumb and thoughtless—to offer praise to Thee?"

We close these extracts from Mr. Cardwell's interesting papers with this interesting "Te Deum." They may serve to remind us that neither faith, virtue, nor truth is the exclusive property of either Christian or heathen. We hope Mr. Cardwell will be encouraged to republish and extend his researches in Tamil folk-lore and poetry, the rich inheritance of ten millions of our fellow-subjects in Southern India.

AN AMERICAN MYSTIC.

THE INDEX should preserve in its columns this interesting account, by the poet Whittier, of his remarkable townsman, Henry Taylor. I can heartily endorse, from personal knowledge, much of what he says, both as to the high character of Henry Taylor, and the depth and beauty of his thoughts. He belonged to a class who are as genuine an outgrowth of the New England temperament and traditions as was Horace Greeley in his direction, or James Flak, Jr., in his.

T. W. H.

The present number of the Villager chronicles, in its obituary department, the death of Henry Taylor of Amesbury. Quiet, unassuming, and simple in all his habits, an unlettered workman, he gave no outward evidence, beyond the reticent gravity of his manner, of the profound intellectual abstraction, the depth of philosophic meditation which made up his real life. He was no reader, probably he never mastered half a dozen books, and he felt small interest in the thoughts and opinions of others. I remember on the occasion of one of my first conversations with him, twenty-five years ago, that I was struck by a remark which indicated a knowledge of Plato. On inquiry, however, I found he had no idea that such a man ever lived. I lent him a volume, which he partially read, and returned with the simple remark that "he saw that Plato had got hold of some of his own ideas." A volume of Emerson, Alger's Oriental Poetry, and the New Testament, were the only books that he ever referred to. The latter was his constant text-book, and he reproduced the incidents recorded in the Gospels, with wonderful vividness of coloring and clearness of insight. The words of the Divine Master had for him a depth of meaning which he found difficult to translate into common language, and he was compelled often to make words to express himself. He watched with absorbing interest the gradual processes and unfoldings of his own mind, and spoke of them as if he had no personal concern in the matter, regarding his mental movements as impelled by a power not his own. He had only to wait and observe, like the recluse of Wordsworth, the revelations of "the power,

That of themselves our minds impress."

He was Oriental in his cast of mind; he would have been quite at home with Chinese benzes, Buddhist priests, Mahomedan dervishes, and Christian monks of Mt. Athos. Yet he was never gloomy nor ascetic; he had a quick sense of the ludicrous, and could easily put himself in the bystander's position and smile at his own peculiarities and inconsistencies.

He had somehow reached a state of absolute quietude—a region of ineffable calm, blown over by no winds of hope or fear. All personal anxieties and solicitudes were unknown. The outward world was phantasmal and unreal—he was utterly beyond its common temptations, and looked with simple wonder upon the struggle for wealth and place, the strifes and ambitions of sects and parties about him. To art, if we except a love of music, he was indifferent. Even the wonderful open book of Nature seemed to have no attractions for him. He seemed nearer than any one I had ever known, to have realized that the things seen are temporal and illusive, but "the things unseen are eternal." He used to quote with much intensity of meaning, the words which Prof. Plumtree attributes to the founder of Buddhism, on reaching the condition of absolute rest. It was a description of his own state, in which the Nirvana of the Buddhist, the mystic suicide and self-abnegation of the Moslem Sufi, the absorption into the Divine will of the Christian mystics, and "the rest which remaineth for the people of God," seemed to him but different names for the same spiritual experience. It must not be inferred that he was blind to, or neglectful of, the duties pertaining to time and space. On the contrary, he was, in practical matters, of sound judgment, prompt to aid and wise to counsel, a good neighbor and citizen. His life was pure; he had no enemies; he cherished no antagonisms. What Lord Bacon calls "the colors of good and evil" blended in the white light of his optimism; and all things were reconciled in his conception of the Divine order. Every way a man noteworthy and remarkable, there are many who will love to recall the rare phenomena of his words and life.

He has passed the gates of the Great Mystery; and to-day, while the earth is closing over all that was mortal, I seem to hear him, as in one of our latest conversations, repeat the words of Jesus to Martha: "I am the Resurrection and the Life; whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held at ODEON HALL, St. Clair Street, on Sunday evenings, at 7½ o'clock. The public are invited to attend.

CASH RECEIPTS.

For the week ending December 21.—P. Stewart, $2; S. S. Boner, $3; G. G. Brigg, $3; Lonsville Hotel, $2; Jno. Buckler, 25 cts.; Sam'l T. Douglas, $4.50; W. M. Oden, $1.50; Jacob Faquan, $1; Mrs. H. McCaughey, $1.50; E. B. Ward, $3; Edward Sawyer, $5; O. G. Crocker, $4; Jas. C. Boyden, $3; L. T. Ives, $3; Miss H. E. Stevenson, $3; Emily Ward, $2; Stacy Hall, $1; Chas. Richardson, $3; John Chappell-Smith, $3; S. B. Fuller, $3; L. C. Whiting, $1; Jno. P. Frazer, $3; K. T. Wood, $3; F. Mellich, $1; J. Richmond, $3; Sam'l T. Durkee, $3.75; Cornelius Wellington, $4.35; R. Hassall, $2.25; R. Beige, 50 cts.; T. G. Galt, 70 cts.; Wm. Mayman, 70 cts.; Mrs. Fuller, 75 cts.; A. Sechnacher, 50 cts.; J. A. Lambert, 50 cts.; Orin Phelps, $3.50; J. N. Goddard, 50 cts.; J. P. Ruggles, 1.00; St. Louis Book & News Co., $2.50; S. S. Boner, $10.00; Mrs. Fred. Sims, $10.00; L. R. Lee, 10 cts.; Hannah E. Stevenson, 10.00; S. Woodin, $1; W. F. Johnson, 10 cts.; Jno. P. Frazer, $30.00; J. Richmond, $1; C. A. Barry, 10 cts.; Horace B. Hill, 50 cts.; John Alexander, $6; Chas. Howard, $3; Rev. H. C. Jones, $3; Miss Kate Napier, $3; Col. Henry Lyell, $3.50; O. H. Hanlan, $3.50; E. B. Loring, $3.50; Charles Collin, $3; Mrs. P. I. Watson, $3; Sarah F. Barie, $3; H. O. Symonds, $3; Jackson Bros., $3; Hon. Joshua Hill, $3; Joseph Martin, $3; Dr. A. A. Bell, $3; P. H. Magnus, $3; J. F. Broderick, $3.50; Alfred E. Giles, $3; Theophilus Brown, $3; Mrs. S. E. Dorr, $3; Louis Black, $3.50; Henry Abbot, $3; C. H. Brigham, $3; Mrs. H. J. Gale, $4; Dr. Titus L. Brown, $3; N. P. Hallowell, $3; Edw. in Brown, $3; Louisa W. Thurston, $3; Wm. Wickesham, $3; K. L. Deenbergh, $3.35; John H. Deering, $3; Samuel F. Atwood, 50 cts.; John Reid, 50 cts.; F. V. Wise, 75 cts.; L. Newell, 40 cts.; W. J. Trilsson, $3; D. W. Crook, $3 cts.; W. A. Thurston, $3; Mart N. Adams, $3; Geo. W. Cutler, $3; Mrs. Chas. Goodspeed, $3; Fred. Dickinson, $3; Norman Johnson, $3; W. W. Grant, $3; Joseph H. Shearn, $3; P. C. Rowland, $3; J. B. Allen, $3; Geo. A. Thayer, $3; Ellen A. Bicknell, $3; Jno. Curtis, $3; J. H. Anderson, $1; S. Griffith Morgan, $3; Wm. A. Wall, $3; Phoebe B. Dean, $4; Alphonso Taft, $4.50; John Stevenson, $3; Mrs. R. Sleeper, $3; Carl Post, $3.50; A. P. Hulse, $3; C. A. W. Croby, $2.50; N. M. Mann, $3; Mrs. W. P. Perkins, $3.17; E. H. Benn, $1.15; Wm. W. Frothingham, $4.10; Isac P. Greenleaf, $1.50; J. L. Best, 60 cts.; O. G. Daniels, 40 cts.; A. E. Macomber, $156.00; Toledo Printing Co., $10.00; P. M. Bateson, 35 cts.; E. S. Loring, $30.00; Theo. Brown, $10.00; Mrs. A. R. Fort, 50 cts.; Henry Bickok, 10 cts.; James W. Bartlett, $10.00; L. T. Ives, $30.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—THE INDEX is payable in advance. Its friends should not be offended if the paper is stopped at the expiration of their term as indicated by the mail-tag. We have no means of knowing whether they wish it continued or not except by the receipt or non-receipt of the subscription price.

N. B.—Please examine the ADDRESS and DATE on your INDEX mail-tag, and report at once any error in either.

N. B.—If your INDEX mail-tag is not changed within three weeks after renewing your subscription, please notify us immediately. But do not write before the expiration of that time.

N. B.—Postage on THE INDEX is two cents per quarter, dating from receipt of the first number, payable in advance at the place of delivery.

N. B.—Please remit by post-office money-order, by registered letter, or by draft on New York. Cheques on interior banks are liable to discount, and the terms of subscription will be proportionally shortened in the credit.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

N. B.—In case of any error in your mail-tag, always state the post-office at which the paper is received, and also the name just as it is now printed. Then state any desired correction.

RECEIVED.

THE WOODS AND BY-WAYS OF NEW ENGLAND. By WILSON FLAGG, Author of "Studies in Field and Forest." With Illustrations. Boston: JAMES R. OSGOOD & Co. 1873. pp. 442.

THE PORT AT THE BREAKFAST TABLE. His Talks with his fellow Boarders at the Reader. Boston: JAMES R. OSGOOD & Co. 1873. pp. 418.

THE COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS OF JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER. Household Edition. Boston: JAMES R. OSGOOD & Co. 1873. pp. 386.

OFF THE SKELLIE. A Novel. By JEAN INGELW. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS. 1873. pp. 666.

AGENT JO'S SCRAP-BAG. SHAWL STORIES. By LOUISA M. ALCOTT, Author of "Little Women," "An Old Fashioned Girl," "Little Men," "Hospital Sketches." Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS. 1873. pp. 236.

THE LULLABIES OF LULLINGSTONE. By EMMA JANE WOODBINE. Illustrated. New York: DODD & MEAD, 762 Broadway. 1873. pp. 433.

FOR CONSCIENCE'S SAKE. By the Author of "Alice Lee's Discipline," etc. New York: DODD & MEAD, 762 Broadway. 1873. pp. 215.

LINCOLN INSTITUTE, Jefferson, Missouri. Full History of its Conception, Struggles, and Triumph. The Dedictory Speech of Colonel DAVID BRANSON.

CRIME AND PUNISHMENT. A Sermon by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, preached in Lyric Hall, December 8th, 1873. New York: D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1873.

THE EARTH A GREAT MACHINE. A Lecture delivered before the Yale Scientific Club, February 14, 1873. By ALFRED MARSHALL MAYOR, Ph. D., Professor of Physics in the Stevens Institute of Technology. New Haven, Conn.: CHARLES C. CHATFIELD & Co. 1873.

ORIGIN OF THE LEONARDS OF ABRAHAM, ISAAC, AND JACOB. Critically Examined by A. HERNSTEIN. Translated from the German. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, No. 11, The Terrace, Park Road, Upper Norwood, London, S. E. Price One Shilling.

"BELIEFS OF THE UNBELIEVERS." An Essay Read before the New Haven Radical Club, March 10, 1873, by HUGH B. BROWN.

LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE, JANUARY, 1874. J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co., Philadelphia.

TO-DAY. Christmas Number. Philadelphia: McCLEAN, STODART & Co., 738 Sanson Street. (Dr. Dio Lewis, Editor.)

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE, December, 1873. Mrs. M. G. BLAND, Editor. Chicago: Office, 335 West Madison St.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000. SHARES EACH $100.
 The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 26, 1874. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED elsewhere, Nine Hundred Shares, $90,000
ARNOLD TANKER, New York, N. Y., One	100
A. M. LEE, " " " " " "	100
PARDON ARMINGTON, Lawrence, Mass., " " " "	100
Mrs. H. E. PERKINS, Dover, N. H., " " " "	100
MISS EMILY BORN, New York, N. Y., " " " "	100
J. GOLDMARK, " " " " " "	100
CHAR. A. GURLEY, Palisaki, N. Y., Two	200
ALEX. OCHSBAUM, Franklin, Pa., Five	500
Mrs. L. M. PLUMMER, Newbury, Mass., One	100
NATHANIEL LITTLE, " " " " " "	100
NATHANIEL LITTLE, JR., " " " " " "	100
CHARLES EDMUND, Oberlin, Ohio, " " " "	100
S. NAUMANN, New York, N. Y., " " " "	100
ANDREW E. WATKINS, Elion, " " " "	100
CHAS. BUFFUM, Lynd, Mass., " " " "	100
Mrs. A. F. CURTIS, Cambridgeport, " " " "	100
JOHN McDUFFIE, " " " " " "	100
Mrs. M. E. BIRD, New York, N. Y., " " " "	100
L. E. BROCKWAY, Brooklyn, " " " "	100
A. LOOS, Philadelphia, Pa., " " " "	100
PETER LESTER, Germantown, " " " "	100
R. M. WHIPPLE, Chicago, Ill., Two	200
Mrs. S. B. HERRY, Washington, D. C., One	100
MISS E. T. COWFESTER, " " " " " "	100
GEO. H. FRANCIS, Montclair, N. J., " " " "	100
DARTON LYMAN, Washington, D. C., " " " "	100
WM. C. HEAD, Philadelphia, Pa., " " " "	100
A. L. MURDER, Rockford, Ill., " " " "	100
Mrs. H. T. CAMPBELL, Jersey City, N. J., " " " "	100
WM. BERNHAN, Brooklyn, N. Y., " " " "	100
JAS. W. WHITE, Jersey City, N. J., Five	500
JAS. W. BARTLETT, Dover, N. H., One	100
J. LERNAU, New York, N. Y., " " " "	100
CHAS. H. SHEPARD, Brooklyn, N. Y., Two	200

$94,700

The Index.

DECEMBER 28, 1872.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

BUSINESS NOTICE.—All communications without exception, on all matters pertaining to the paper, should be addressed to "THE INDEX, DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO." All cheques, drafts, and post office money orders, should be made payable to "THE INDEX ASSOCIATION." No responsibility is assumed for loss of money or neglect in the fulfillment of orders, unless these directions are STRICTLY COMPLIED WITH.

PERSONAL AND IMPERSONAL JOURNALISM.

Emphasizing, as radicalism must, the transcendent importance of individuality, THE INDEX has innovated upon the practice of other papers in its editorial department. It is usual to sink out of sight the personality of those who write editorially; and, as a necessary consequence, the "managing editor" assumes to decide what opinions shall find utterance in the editorial columns. Our plan, although pronounced impracticable by some, has been radically different, and after a fair trial must be declared a success. All who have been invited to speak on the editorial platform of THE INDEX (and we have invited none but those whose high moral and intellectual character commands universal respect) speak as equals and brothers in a great common cause,—none first and none last. To make perfect independence and freedom of utterance compatible with a closely associated position, the uniform practice has been to affix the signature or initials of the writer to all editorial articles, except in our own case; and the sole reason of this exception has been to avoid the too frequent and disagreeable repetition of the same initials. For every article or paragraph in the editorial department (including the "Editorial Book Notices") which has had no signature, we desire it to be distinctly understood that we are alone responsible; and we assume responsibility for nothing that we have not personally written. The same will be equally true in the future. By this very simple arrangement, a glance at the list of editorial writers will at once convey information as to the authorship of the various articles.

It is thus alone, as we believe, that the necessity of personal supervision could be avoided. If it were not known who writes the articles that appear in THE INDEX as editorial, the responsibility for all opinions expressed in these columns would rest with the editor, who in self-defence would be obliged to exercise a certain censorship over them. The plan adopted obviates this necessity, and therefore leaves each writer in perfect freedom. The "impersonal journalism" sometimes praised has some advantages, it must be confessed; but it sacrifices that for which no advantages can compensate, namely, liberty. This is the very soul of radicalism. Without it there could be no excuse for a radical journal at all, since it must in the nature of the case be false to its own principles. The whole tendency of American journalism is from the impersonal to the personal type; and the reason of it lies in the character of American institutions, of which freedom is the very breath of life. The North American Review, for example, is very much freer and better, in our opinion, since it abandoned the impersonal system; and no one who thoroughly considers the influence ultimately exercised over a people by their political institutions will doubt that the personal system must at last prevail in the weekly and daily press. Let every newspaper writer be obliged to sign his name, and how speedily the abusiveness, the recklessness, the consciencelessness, that now disgrace the press both secular and religious, would vanish under the frown of public opinion! There will be no cure for the great abuses of the modern newspaper, until every writer is made to stand publicly as sponsor to his own statements.

In adopting this personal style of journalism, THE INDEX not only illustrates the true genius of radicalism and dispenses with the leadership and tyranny of the "responsible editor," but also, to the extent of its influence, must tend to elevate the tone of the public press in general by doing something to substitute a better editorial system in the place of the one now prevailing.

THE HEAD AND THE HEART.

We are rather disposed than otherwise to be jealous for the rights and the opportunities of the intellect. In all the history of religion we find it to have been hardly dealt with,—its claims resisted, its rights denied, its statements and suggestions rudely and contemptuously put aside. Faith, not knowledge, has been the watchword of the Church in all ages and places; authority, not demonstration, has been its rule of action. Only in these modern times has science got a fair footing and secured for itself a decent respect in the domain of truth with religion; and, even now, religion slowly and grudgingly admits science into its presence on equal grounds, and shows no cheerful willingness to render unto this intellectual Caesar the things which are belonging to it.

But, nevertheless, we believe the day of science has really come, and henceforth, as between it and religion, if either is to speak as having authority, science must so speak. We have the greatest interest to hear what it has to say on all those matters which religion has hitherto exclusively dealt with, and are prepared to receive its utterances with profound respect and marked deference.

But because we believe that the high court of science has at last opened, and the intellect been enthroned on the judicial seat, we hasten with all modesty yet with all earnestness to put in an appearance in behalf of the heart, and to beg that its claims may not now in turn be overridden by those of the head. Let not science, we implore, now play the part of tyrant, and try to banish religion from the realm. The matters of religion still present themselves in the great assezes of humanity, as among the most important of all the cases on the docket; and in these matters the heart appears with the head, as an equally essential and credible witness: let not these matters nor this witness be dismissed with indifference or with scorn.

Yet are not most scientists disposed to do this? Now that they have really got the floor, are they in their turn willing to yield it to religion to ask questions, and will they try without bias and without levity to return answer? Humanity is hungry for the truth, but it has two mouths to be fed: one is of the head, the other is of the heart. Some men, we are aware, may and do shut the heart and receive the truth only into the understanding. These are willing to vote that God and immortality are misplaced questions in the court of science, irrelevant and unimportant; that science indeed has but one real domain, and that is purely physical; that it has but one real duty to perform, and that is to investigate the material. But we are also aware that there is another and very large class of men who cannot and do not close up the heart to truth; who cannot and do not stop thinking and feeling and hoping about God and immortality, nor ceasing to cherish a deep-rooted conviction that, after all is said and done, these will turn out to be blessed facts; who, in spite of assertions to the contrary, persist in believing that science has a spiritual as well as a material realm, and that its duty is just as legitimate and important to investigate the things of soul as those of sense. These latter men, and women, observe life in its most pathetic aspects; they come face to face with all its tragic elements; they walk through deep and painful experiences, overhung by clouds of doubt and shrouded in mists of tears,—and they somehow cannot resist the impression that just beyond the seen is the unseen, just beneath the transient is the permanent, just above the actual is the ideal; that, in short, if there is no God there ought to be, and if this life gets no margin in another, then this life is terribly incomplete and inexplicable. Such men and women are not cowards, they are not fools; they are among the bravest and wisest of the earth; and yet they cannot stifle the voice of the heart, but let it be lifted up and claim its rights with those of the head.

Let us remember that science has not yet returned an absolute NO to the questions of God and immortality: it has only said they are questions, not dogmas. Until science is able clearly and decidedly to disprove what the heart demands, the heart may without the charge of weakness and folly refuse to adjourn its claim, or to acknowledge it to be inferior to any other. The domain of truth belongs jointly to science and religion, to the head and the heart; neither may exclude nor transgress the other. And though the God which religion alone created is retreating, that which science shall discover, we believe, advancing. Let us wait in patience and in trust, and in due time "the God of science" will arrive, and religion shall rejoice in his coming. A. W. S.

"BREVITY THE SOUL OF WIT."

It is necessary to say that we expect to allot no more space to miscellaneous "Communications" in the enlarged INDEX than we have done in the past. No "Communication" will be welcome unless it is short. The interests of our readers are paramount to those of long-winded writers who may be anxious to see themselves in print; and there is vastly more important work to do than to publish their lucubrations. THE INDEX is not, and has never pretended to be, a "free paper" in the sense of publishing whatever is sent to it, good, bad, or indifferent. It is a "free paper" only in the sense that the ablest and best articles sent to it are admitted to its columns, regardless of the unpopularity of the particular opinions they may advocate. Again and again have we published articles with which we have had little or no intellectual sympathy; and the stronger they may be, the quicker shall we be to publish them hereafter. But, not being able to write long explanatory letters to the numerous contributors who send us bulky manuscripts, we wish to save both them and us much unnecessary trouble by reminding them that we want no "Communications" which are not brief, pithy, and charged with thought or information. We do not say absolutely that we shall publish no long articles sent by volunteer writers: there are exceptions to most rules. But we wish them to understand that whoever sends such an article is asking a very great favor at the expense of other people whose articles are thereby crowded out. It is not thought polite at a public table to occupy three or four chairs, especially if others are thus prevented from occupying any. The case is the same when a writer solicits three or four columns in a public journal, although he may not see the great pile of manuscripts patiently awaiting their turn. It is thoughtlessness that is the trouble, combined with a little excess of philoprogenitiveness. Not to be misunderstood, we repeat what we have in effect said before, that, while we are grateful for good brief articles (not exceeding, for instance, a column), the warmth of our gratitude rapidly diminishes in proportion as that limit is overpassed.

SYSTEM.

The necessity of order and system in human thought is well expressed by Professor Tyndall in his Forms of Water [page 72]: "It is because facts of Nature are not isolated but connected, that science, to follow them, must also form a connected whole. The mind of the natural philosopher must, as it were, be a web of thought corresponding in all its fibres with the web of fact in Nature." The distrust of system in religious thought, begotten by its abuse in Christian dogmatics, has disinclined modern radicals to look favorably on any attempt even to use it wisely in the reconstruction of the now discordant convictions of mankind. Yet no one who reflects can gainsay the truth that, before radicalism can take the place of the Church in directing the highest aspirations of humanity, it must secure harmony and unity in its own ideas, —in the views of life and society which it proposes to make the basis of a new and better order of things. Above all else, the one thing needed now is the reduction of disconnected radical thinking to its essential principles, to the end that it may organize itself as the great controlling power of modern life. When this is done, it will turn out that the intellectual system of Free Religion is simply the intellectual system of Science; but it will also turn out that the intellectual system of Science itself will be inconceivably vaster and sublimer than is suspected by any promoter of it at the present day.

With the present issue of THE INDEX closes its third volume. The next issue will be enlarged to twice the number of pages. That the paper may henceforth accomplish more than twice the amount of good is our deep desire, and will be our strenuous endeavor. But as the world pays little heed to professions and demands performance, we make no sounding promises. It is enough to say that, although we have met several disappointments in providing for the enlargement, we believe that the real and staunch friends of the movement which THE INDEX represents and advocates will at least find no cause to regret the change. From the start our aim has been to achieve practical and permanent results rather than to make pleasant reading for the hour; and, with more gratitude than we care to express to those who have put into our hands a powerful tool, we turn our back upon the past, and look forward with hope to the important work of the coming year.

The New York office of the Index Association has been removed from No. 22, Vesey Street, to No. 36, Day Street. Mr. Henry H. Richardson, who has kindly acted as our agent in that city during the past year, finds it necessary to devote his entire time to his own business; and Mr. E. F. Dinsmore has with equal kindness volunteered to carry on the agency in his stead. We return our sincere thanks to both.

Some time since a correspondent in Indiana thus rehearsed the fate of a package of INDEX tracts:—

"Your 'Impeachments' arrived as ordered to-day; I presume about twenty or thirty of them. But—

'Alas for the rarity
Of Christian charity!'

My landlady's vigilant eyes fell upon them, and her hands sacrificed them—all but one. This one she retained, that she might 'spot' the passages that had kindled her ire. She burned them. She is determined and executive—determined and persistent I. Send me another batch!"

What a penetrating intellect was that of the minister who found a signal proof of the goodness of God in the fact that "the moments of time come consecutively, and not simultaneously"! How could we have got along if they had all come pell-mell at once?

THE DECLINE OF PERSECUTION.

The only time I ever heard old Dr. Beecher preach, he thanked God, in prayer, that the community still retained "enough of moral force to hang a man." Ought we to be glad or sorry that the Christian Church around us no longer exhibits this amount of vigor?

The change is convenient for some of us, no doubt. Without it, THE INDEX would long since have been burnt by some modern Inquisition of Toledo—ominous name!—and its editor and contributors would have shared the same fate. Or, at best, we might be working out our sentence in the chain-gang, like our fellow-heretic, Mr. W. L. Jones, of Australia. Practically, therefore, this lenity is a convenience. But intellectually it does no credit to those who are lenient. It simply shows that they hold a creed without the moral consistency to act up to it.

It was said the other day, by Rev. Dr. Thompson of New York, that the Christian religion, "by its very nature, is intolerant," "declares war against all differences," "has a clean-cut, definite creed, and says there is one God and one Lord Jesus Christ, and there is no other name given among men whereby they can be saved." (See INDEX Aug. 3, 1872.)

If this be the case, how can any man, believing this, venture on toleration? If this be the one means of salvation for mankind, what right has any one to permit THE INDEX or anything else to obstruct it? If this creed be Scriptural, —and I do not see how any one can doubt it,—the utmost atrocities of the Roman Catholic Church seem to follow of course. Given the first step, you must concede the whole. Accept the Bible as an infallible book, and the massacre of St. Bartholomew is a mere inevitable consequence; altogether creditable to the logic of those who planned it, and only discreditable to their hearts.

"Toleration," said an Englishman of science, the other day, "is a sign of conscious weakness. We are all tolerant when we are not sure that we are right." But the English statesman, Fox, had said the same thing before him, far more vigorously, in conversation with the poet Rogers. "The only foundation for toleration is a degree of scepticism, and without it there can be none. For if a man believes in the saving of souls, he must soon think about the means, and if by cutting off one generation he can save many future ones from hell-fire, it is his duty to do it."

We therefore find, through all Christian history, that the great acts of persecution were not done in waywardness or licentiousness, but under spasms of conscience. No man was ever more devout in his religious duties than Philip of Spain. "Few men or women have ever lived," according to Froude, "less capable of doing knowingly a wrong thing" than Bloody Mary. It was to atone for his sins, and fulfil his mother's dying wish, that Louis XIV. persecuted the Huguenots; it was almost on his death-bed, and as an act of penitence, that he revoked the edict of Nantes, and forbade Protestants either to exercise their religion or to leave the country. Bossuet and Massillon, the great pulpit orators of the time, approved his act. They were right in doing it; he could not honestly profess his creed and do otherwise.

But if Protestantism still holds to the Bible as infallible, it has no more right to tolerance than had the Roman Catholic Church. How feeble, for instance, is the evasive attitude of the Church of England before the Athanasian creed! There are the "damnable clauses," which the Church requires to be read. If he rejects the creed, "without doubt he shall perish everlastingly." Nothing can be clearer than this statement; nor do I see how anything can be more Scriptural. But the Ritual Commission finds no more difficulty in explaining away these clauses than in getting rid of the Scripture on which they rest. They are only "a solemn warning of peril." All the professors of Divinity in the University of Oxford, including Dr. Pusey, have concurred in the statement, "That nothing in this creed is to be understood as condemning those who by involuntary ignorance or blind prejudice are hindered from accepting the faith thus declared." And other disclaimers, more and more nearly official, have since followed. The Creed in vain says, "without doubt perish everlastingly." But there is doubt. The highest church dignitaries themselves doubt it, and they dare not enforce it according to its literal truth.

The simple truth is that the increase of toleration marks the decay of the old faith. Those who believe in Natural Religion do not complain, in this age, of persecution. They complain of non-persecution. If it be perdition to reject the stonement or the miraculous birth of Jesus, then we who lead men to reject it ought to be imprisoned or put to death. It is better that we should be thus dealt with, than that we should lead souls to destruction. So long as we are not thus dealt with, we complain that the Church does not believe its own doctrines, or else that it does not care whether souls die or live.

T. W. H.

LETTER FROM MR. WANHSURN TO MR. POTTER.

MY DEAR SIR:—

In THE INDEX for September 21, you ask me whether there is any theological school in this country where students begin their study without any Christian bias, and are encouraged to keep so; whether any person, however fitted by scholarship and character, would be likely to be appointed professor in the Harvard Divinity School, if his free inquiry had led him to views opposed to Christianity, —and how generally Unitarians have arrived at their Christian belief without any pre-determination in its favor? If these questions be answered according to the evident facts of the case, you ask further: "Can it (then) be claimed that pure freedom of thought is yet accepted generally by Unitarians as the necessary method of theological study?"

One thing at a time. We may fairly distinguish between a principle and the practical application of it, though they are intimately related. However simple the principle may be, the application will be manifold, multiform, and subject to complex conditions. What I specially meant to claim, and still claim, for the Unitarians is, that they accept the method of free inquiry in religion. I know that Father Hecker, and other less Orthodox but sufficiently Orthodox persons, claim freedom as well as we; but when they define their freedom, we perceive a difference between theirs and ours. But you and I agree, I think, as to what is meant by the free method; namely, that the final earthly appeal in matters of religious truth is to the human mind in direct relation with the truth itself. That I claim to be the generally accepted method of the Unitarian denomination at present. Not that very many among us have any method at all in a developed sense; not that there is not a considerable minority who would limit this freedom by ascribing an overruling authority to some part of the Bible, such as the part sometimes called the "very words of Jesus;" not that we are not conditioned in a great variety of ways in our practical application of this free method; but, in spite of this, I still claim that the spirit of the Unitarian body as a whole is in accordance with this free method. For myself, I lay the principle down,—the human spirit directly related with the reality itself, not overruled by any institution, book, or person, neither by the Church or any of its officers, the Bible or any of its parts, nor by Jesus Christ; but seeing in these an inspiration like its own, and so helped by them according to their power. This statement, I suppose, would startle many Unitarians—perhaps the majority of them, if pressed home to them. Indeed it is not easy to come at the spirit of a large body of men with any accuracy, it varies so much. Still I claim the general temper of the body, as shown in its current literature, preaching, and conversation, to be theologically free: as far, that is, as we can claim such freedom for any considerable body of the public; as far as we can for the Free Religious body, for instance, including under that term the general body of sympathizers with Free Religion. We say they believe in freedom, knowing that comparatively few of them have much definite conception of what constitutes freedom; that all abound in limitations, like the rest of us, and that in their practical action they are all very much conditioned by circumstances, education, traditions, and the like. I claim no exemption for us Unitarians from human conditions of all sorts. Nor do I claim any "pure freedom of thought" for us any more than you can for your body. Simply taking a comparative standard, and allowing for human conditions, I claim that our religious position is one of freedom; which is all that you or any one can claim for any general body of people. I am also aware that the Unitarian denomination, having existed for some time, and gathered something of a body to itself, is less mobile or fluid, than the Free Religious party, and that your comparative absence of body, of positive traditions, buildings, schools, and so forth, has its conveniences. But you will grow out of that very soon, if you continue to thrive, and will necessarily take on a more complicated existence with your growth.

I answer, then, all your preliminary questions as you evidently would yourself; but I do not draw your conclusion. In the first place, it seems to me a necessary human condition that every man should be largely predetermined. Turn your questions on any body of men. How many of the Free Religious body, for instance, have arrived at their present state with no bias, reactionary or otherwise, toward it? How many would now begin to study religion unbiased? With regard to the appointment of a non-Christian professor, I think an ideal university would give a place for every honest and powerful mind; but considering the slight support which the Harvard School receives, the practical as well as scientific objects which it has to attend to, and the general low ebb at which theology stands among us, and the consequent lack of public sympathy, I think it maintains a highly creditable freedom. In any school of the small size of that school, the results of past inquiry are inevitably complicated with the method (or in other words, Christianity with free inquiry), much more than they would be in the theological schools of a more scientific community,—more than they are in Germany. I do not claim for the Cambridge school any ideal freedom, but I think it the freest there is in this country, and tending to a larger freedom. If the Free Religious body can provide a better, the field is open. But they have none yet, and so comparison is impossible. If, however, you look at the reception given by the Unitarians to the scientific theology of the time, I think you will find it a very sympathetic one. Schools are corporations and move a little slowly, as do our other institutions; but I think that ten or twenty years from now the free method which I believe to be generally accepted by Unitarians will be more fully incorporated in their institutions, though it seems to me pretty well incorporated in them already.

Very truly yours,
FRANCIS T. WASHBURN.

[It is difficult to argue with a person with whom one finds himself in substance so largely agreeing as I am inclined to agree with Mr. Washburn in the essential points of his communication. When he writes, "For myself, I lay the principle down,—the human spirit directly related with the reality itself, not overruled by any institution, book, or person, neither by the church or any of its officers, the Bible or any of its parts, nor by Jesus Christ; but seeing in these an inspiration like its own and so helped by them according to their power," but adds that this statement would "startle, perhaps, the majority of Unitarians, if pressed home to them," he seems to me to state very accurately the difference between the Free Religious Association and organized Unitarianism, and just the difference to which I referred in the article of Sept. 21st. He, in fact, makes a proposition in respect to mental freedom which puts himself on the side of the Association, and admits that the majority of the Unitarian body would be reluctant to accept this proposition. How, having made such a concession as this, he can go on to claim that the "general temper" of the body is "theologically free," and as free as is the "Free Religious body," I cannot see. Perhaps he means by the "general temper" of the Unitarian body that Unitarianism began historically with the more emphatic assertion of the right of free inquiry, and that this principle of freedom still has great traditional and real strength in the denomination. In this, too, I should agree with him, but should think that, if he merely meant to say this, his language was to be criticized for want of clearness.

But in this matter of mental freedom, since all people,—at least all Protestant people in Christendom and many Catholics,—claim to have it, the ultimate test must be a practical one. I have a neighbor who is an Orthodox Congregationalist minister. He is one who cannot brook the claim that any other people are more free or liberal than his own denomination. "You Unitarians," he once said to me, "make a great boast of liberality, but you are no more liberal than we are." "We both make the claim," I replied; "now let us test the matter practically. I am not much of a 'Unitarian,' but you concede me to be one. I will exchange pulpits with you some Sunday; will you exchange with me?" "Well,—no; he couldn't." He considered himself "under a contract to his society that its pulpit should give utterance to views within certain evangelical limits." "And that," said I, "shows just the difference between the liberality of your society and mine. My society holds me to no such contract, but, though not agreeing with your views, will like to hear you present them next Sunday in my place, if you will make the exchange." He has never responded to the offer. So Unitarians claim to be governed by the principle of mental freedom, but practically they continually fail to meet the tests of freedom. Relatively, the principle of intellectual freedom may be said to have been uppermost with them, until Theodore Parker came and showed how honest free inquiry might lead to the rejection of the specific authority of the Bible and of Jesus; then they were alarmed and in all practical ways excommunicated Parker for these results to which his honest thought had brought him. And from that time until this, Unitarianism in all its organizations has tried somehow to show that the free inquiry which it fellowships must accept in some sense the special authority of Jesus and the peculiar claims of Christianity. Lately, as free inquiry has been pushing out to conclusions farther than ever Parker's went, this test of fellowship has been again and again applied. How often has it been reiterated, in the last few years, in the Unitarian conferences, conventions, newspapers, magazines, that the phrase, "Liberty and Christ," is the proper motto of Unitarianism! Now I submit that for a denomination to declare with one breath for mental freedom, and with the next to lay down the results to which free inquiry must come or else submit to denominational excision, is not to be theologically free. And I do not believe that Mr. Washburn on reflection will claim that this Unitarian adhesion to the "authority of Christ" is to any great extent the result of free rational thought. It is rather the traditional ecclesiastical reverence for Jesus which has permeated Christendom generally; and to say that believers in Free Religion may have been as much biased to their views as a Christian sect to theirs, would be to say that free religious views prevail in Christendom and enter into the substance of education as much as does the view that Christianity is a special divine revelation.

The Free Religious Association has, it is true, no theological school or other institutions. But it has itself; and a legitimate comparison may be made between itself as an organization and the organizations of Unitarianism. Certainly, no one can believe that, if it were to organize a theological school or any other institutions, it would build them on any less broad basis than the principles of its own constitution. Its theological school, if it ever have one, must be organized in the interest of universal truth and not of any sect or special religion.

In conclusion, I would join most heartily in what Mr. Washburn says of the good work done by the Harvard Divinity School in the direction of religious freedom. I myself owe to it and its professors, who are now gone, too much to forget the debt. I know, too, that it has living professors who are alive to the demands of intellectual liberty. Still, as Mr. Washburn admits, it is not all that a school for the free and scientific study of theology should be. That it may become such and the Free Religious Association, therefore, have no occasion to establish another, I certainly most earnestly hope.—W. J. F.]

The Scotsman, in an obituary notice of Bishop Terrot, mentions a story which he used to relate with great gusto. It befell a dignified clergyman, perhaps himself. An Irish beggar was imploring him for charity, and using an enormous number of sacred oblations. The dignified clergyman looked him solemnly in the face: "No, I will not give relief to one who appeals to me so indecorously; but I will give you what will be of more value to you in your present state of mind—the advice not to take the name of God in vain." Irishman answers: "And be it in vain I've been taking it? And whose fault is that, I should like to know?"

Charles Lamb, one afternoon, in retiring from a dinner party, took his seat in a crowded omnibus, when a stout gentleman subsequently looked in and politely asked, "All full inside?" "I don't know how it may be, sir, with the other passengers," answered Lamb, "but that last piece of pie did the business for me."

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

THE RADICAL CHRISTIAN DEMAND.

BY REV. EDWARD C. TOWNE.

In my last I stated some chief points of what seem to me the Radical Christianity which study and thought are converting the former Christianity into. This former Christianity had its origin in the mixed truth and error of original Christianity. The radical method puts both the former and the original through the refining fire of free thought, and accepts as a Christianity worth having only that which comes out pure truth, and which appears to have existed, a genuine ore of divinity, in the original Christianity of that young man who is, by Judaic and heathen mistake, called the Lord Jesus, and which still more existed in the best teaching of that much greater man, Paul. It will be remembered that the Christian name arose under Paul, at Antioch, and with Jesus nor with his immediate disciples. So it is not necessary to fasten on more than one good-suggest of pure truth in Jesus to connect back to him. The much dross of the fanaticism of his disciples before Paul, and of himself also as far as we can see, is no argument against the real gold of doctrine which sound reason finds in him. He taught blind trust in God and fraternal love to man; and this teaching has outgrown the increasing error of centuries, and now takes the Christian name to itself, by the increasing consent of those who have inherited that name, and according to that method of evolution and purification, the natural selection of the best elements and death of the worse, which is the highest method of philosophy. The time may come when some new name will attach to both the believers and the beliefs, in place of Christian and Christianity; but of this we have no sign at present, Christian being used in an amply free sense, and Christianity being equally capable of being used to denote the residuum in the refiner's fire of free thought.

It will be observed that Radical Christianity says OUR FATHER from beginning to end, precisely as Jesus did when he taught his disciples how to pray; and that it worships the Father in spirit and in truth, not in Jesus nor in the Bible. To Radical Christianity it is the heathenization of the faith to identify God, and his infinite providence and inspiration, with any human person or life or writings. The deceitful and desperately wrong heart of man has done this without the least good Christian reason. We must have conscience, courage, and faith to undo it, whatever it may cost our traditional prejudices. It was simple truth which Jesus uttered when he said: "The chief of all the commandments is, 'Hear, O Israel! the Lord our God is the only Lord; and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart, and thy whole soul, and thy whole mind, and thy whole strength.' This is the chief commandment; and the second is like unto it, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.' There is no other commandment greater than these." The whole spirit of pure Hebrew and pure Christian devotion forbids religious regard for any other name than that of the Divine Father.

So believes the Radical Christian. And with a passion of devotion he says to the dogmatist who follows with Orthodoxy:—

"Who art thou, child of a moment and clod of the dust, to take up the understanding of the Almighty as a little thing, and as a very little thing to scan distrustfully the plan of Divine Fatherhood which is from eternity to eternity?"

"Is the living God a man that he should not know; or a son of man that he should not desire; or less than the creature made in his image,—that he should not prevail, to turn the heads of the children unto the Father, and to make the ends of the earth subject to the Throne of Eternity?"

"He that would dwell in God, let him give his hand to souls that are hurt, and his heart to them that perish, and he shall possess heaven unawares, before the time of exceeding glory."

"It is not in him that thinketh, nor in them that make words; but when the heart burneth tenderly, and the hand is stretched out helpfully, then is the very Reason of God made flesh."

"Saith the most holy Word from the bosom of the Father, I will not speak in the speech by which ye boast yourselves over them that perish; and as a mother sheltereth with her breast will I shelter from the judgment of perdition with which ye judge."

"The perfection of the Almighty is more patient than the pure light, and, though evil join with evil, the second death shall not hold any creature of God."

"To divide between the soul of man and the sorrow of sin, with the quick and powerful spirit of God, that evil may not corrupt forever, is the holy justice of the Divine Fatherhood."

"If it delight you not to look unwearyingly for restoration by the mighty hand of God, then are ye as one that, with closed eyes, waketh in thought, but knoweth not that the sun is risen in his strength.

"Have faith in God, and ye shall see the valley of dry bones moving like an army with banners, and the realms of the dead gathering to the regeneration of holiness as doves to their windows.

"Let then the courage of your expectation be as the depth of the heavens over you, and the quiet of your confidence as when the stars in their courses fulfil the purpose of God.

"O thou little one and troubled, have neither fear nor doubt, for in thy bruised feet walketh surely the purpose of God, and by thy stumbling steps cometh the indwelling majesty of heaven.

"If the holy wisdom dwell in you purely, your eyes shall be like the open windows of heaven, and looking after souls which have gone down into darkness, even the way of the abyss shall shine like a path of pure gold.

"When your eyes behold a man, let it be a revelation of the work of God, and when ye take the hand of a fellow-man, let it be a sacrament of God with us, until the glory of the Divine Love fill the whole earth.

"If there be not with you the reconciliation of believers, ye know not the gate; if ye cannot by faith see the reconciliation with sinners, ye know not the white throne.

"Bar not out nor refuse any son of man, neither think that temple walls and altars are sufficient to sons of God; for the world is in the Father's hand, and he that leaveth or loveth not a soul doth not know the kingdom of God.

"Build ye new folds, like the flocks of all the earth for multitude, and bring into them no other faith than to love one another out of perfect trust in the Divine Love.

"Let it not be so much as named or imagined that brother should not cleave unto brother, in the pure sacrament which is the bond of perfectness, both for the life which now is and for that which is to come.

"The voice of Divine Love, to them which keep holiness holily, commandeth with pure commandment that the children look unto the Father within one rule and order of charity."

TRUE WORSHIP.

The lecture of Mr. Abbot on "Pagan and Christian Idolatry," recently published in THE INDEX, is a most beautiful announcement of faith in the unseasoned and unseen, and has made clear to me much that I had felt but could not shape into words. I am indeed immeasurably grateful for this most lucid presentation of the subject of so much thought and discussion—"matter and spirit," or "form" vs. the invisible, intangible, unimaginable "formlessness" of the something we call spirit.

It has been the habit of the Christian Church to repeat the Bible phrases without any, or scarcely any, analysis of their meaning. The desire to know the exact meaning of a word or association of words with which we seek to express an idea or belief, is counted fastidiousness by a class of people indifferent as to whether truth can be really discovered. The world would be dark indeed, if, in the midst of apathy, there were not always some souls to whom truth is as precious as the sight of the eyes. If we cannot by very patient thought find our way out of uncertainties, or if "in its essence nothing can be known," are we to use words the import of which we are wholly incapable of explaining? It were better to remain in doubt, a far more commendable state than to rely upon assertion and profess to believe, because "unbelief" is a hateful thing to the Church. How much better the drifting of a soul forever and ever out into trackless seas of space, than to cramp the intellect with irrational conclusions!

We quote Mr. Abbot's words: "Spirit is thought, intelligence, will, affection, conscience: to attribute form or shape to these is absurd. The idea of form is purely a material one, and cannot be spiritualized." In another place this occurs: "If we are to have such bodies—celestial ones,—they must still be material, although of a higher order of matter. The spiritual body is not the spirit itself: you must think of a soul within that too."

I have not quoted Mr. Abbot's words exactly, or in consecutive order, but this is essentially the connection. The soul, "the pure thought," pure being, with the coverings of "sense and imagination" dropped away, may possibly have a body with form and feature; but within it will dwell still the baffling and formless soul. Who shall say where the boundaries are, or if mind has any limit?

In his "Religion of Humanity," Mr. Frothingham says: "The most unintelligible sayings about God are the most impressive to the religious mind;" and he quotes these words: "I am the Alpha and Omega," and "God is spirit."

The human mind finds itself powerless to reach, in these earlier stages of development, the meaning of these crisp utterances; and all search ends, as it perhaps ever must, in a glorious dream of possibilities.

Herbert Spencer has somewhere said: "In all directions our investigations bring us face to face with an insoluble enigma." But the intellect which never wearies of its task scales all the heights, "sounds all the abysses," to find whence this voice of God in the soul, which is essentially the adoration of spirit for spirit. Superstitions are fading away; and the Christian religion, passing through various transformations, must at last give place to a truly spiritual worship from which all external forms will drop off; for the inward furnishing of the mind will absorb all, and the true beauty will be centred there, needing nothing from without to enhance anything so true as truth!

And while all forms of religious institutions are giving place to ideas which tend to break down limitations, and to a common brotherhood of the race, the deep-sea soundings of mind into the mysteries of a life born out of this may be recognized as revealing a part of truth, and not unworthy the attention and recognition of the most scientific intellects. C. A. B.

HORACE GREELEY AGAIN.

SALEM, Ohio, Dec. 11, 1872.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—In your last issue you insert a few remarks on the death of Horace Greeley, which to my mind deserve a short criticism. In it you speak of him "as the target of poisoned arrows." "Many men are to-day smitten with shame and remorse that their partisan bitterness helped to break a noble heart and craze a noble brain." What you mean by poisoned arrows you do not tell us. Do you mean that shafts of truth are poisoned arrows? If this is your meaning, then I agree with you. But if you mean by the term, lying detraction, then I must make a flat disclaimer. Pray tell me (if the latter is your meaning) who shot poisoned arrows at the sage? When and where are we to find them? Give us the names of those who did it, and the papers where they are recorded. I tried to follow the campaign along as best I could, and to me it was manifest that there was more than usual tenderness exhibited towards Mr. Greeley. The speakers shot no "poisoned arrows," but lamented his fall. They spoke of him as a great journalist, one whose editorials they delighted to read, and so forth; but deplored his great mistake, especially by having nearly every red-handed rebel in his ranks, Jeff Davis as chief. Where are the men who are smitten with remorse, that helped to break a noble heart and craze a noble brain? If there are such, I very much doubt their manliness, and should pronounce it mawkish sentimentality. Much as Mr. Greeley is to be pitied for his folly, we know that it was his own free act that crazed his brain; that he was a victim to his own ambitious weakness. My dear sir, what would you have had men do? Is Mr. Greeley so high in your estimation as to be above criticism? His paper, the Tribune, during the campaign, vomited out more vituperation and filth than ever did Brick Pomeroy's sheet, or the Cincinnati Enquirer. I am too obtuse in intellect to see the force of the idea that no bad acts of a man's life should be mentioned after his death. I do not believe in the dogma of apotheosis. Being a lifelong Abolitionist, I know too much of Mr. Greeley's history in the great anti-slavery conflict to pronounce his course immaculate. I cannot be made to believe that the man who advocated the election of Henry Clay, with such intense earnestness, and who said of the true voting Abolitionists of that day that opposed him and his slaveholding pet, "that they were only fit to pave hell's streets with," has antecedents above criticism. Truly did Mr. Phillips say of him last summer that he (Mr. Greeley) quoted the criticisms of the Abolitionists as certificates that he was not an Abolitionist. Mr. Phillips remarked that if he would come to him now, he could give him certificates to the same effect. I think that the less his partisan friends say of him now, the better for his fame. When I heard of his death, I felt nothing but pity for him. He is gone, and his good works follow him. But what of the bad? Well, if you are agreed from this time to let him rest in peace, I am sure I can cordially shake hands with you, my brother. Yours truly, P. GORDON.

[We print the above, not because we wish to continue in THE INDEX a discussion of Mr. Greeley's character, but because we are unwilling to reject so pointed a criticism of what we have said. Enough has certainly been said on both sides of this subject already, and we do not think it necessary to publish anything further concerning it. We only add that our correspondent cannot have read what we have read within the past few months; and that our estimate of Mr. Greeley is neither that of his ardent friends nor that of his bitter enemies.—Ed.]

A man in St. Louis has lost faith in doctors because shortly after being vaccinated he was bitten by a mad dog.

COMPULSORY WORSHIP IN COLLEGES.

[From the Amherst, Mass., Student.]

It is doubtless known to many of our readers that steps are now being taken to secure a decision from the highest legal authority in the Commonwealth, of the following question: "Has the College a right to compel a citizen of legal age to attend church?"

In our own College,—and from many others we hear the same,—there is a growing feeling among many students representing all shades of religious belief, not only that the compulsory system of worship is unjust, but that it is in defiance of State law. We trust that college journals throughout New England, whatever may be the belief of their editors regarding compulsory worship, will advocate carrying a test case to the highest court and settling this vexed question. It is fitting that this reform should originate at Amherst, so long regarded as a centre of religious culture; it is fitting that it should originate among those who believe that the worship of a few who "enter into his gates with thanksgiving," is more acceptable to him than the mockery of many who approach his courts with a smothered curse.

By request we print below a copy of that portion of the Act of Incorporation of Amherst College relating to this subject (the Italics are our own):—

"And the said Corporation are further empowered . . . to make and ordain, as occasion may require, reasonable rules, orders, and by-laws, not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of this Commonwealth.

"No student shall be refused admission to or denied any of the privileges, honors, or degrees of said College, on account of the religious opinions he may entertain."

THE TRUE GENTLEMAN.—It would be an immense protection against all debasing tendencies if, amid the exactions of our new position, we could carry over those gentlemanly instincts which have hitherto characterized our people. In employing this unusual term, I do not mean that dainty mannerism which puts on the air, without the quality, of the gentleman. But I refer to that exquisite education of the conscience which makes duty and benevolence the habit of the soul; that fastidious honor which cannot, even in thought, condescend to meanness; that lofty self-respect which will observe the proprieties and practice the virtues of life with the readiness of impulse; that nobleness of principle which makes it as easy to be brave and true as it is to breathe; that instinct of rectitude which shrinks from the false and the base as from the contamination of the plague. It would be a rare combination this, of courtly honor with the hardness of toll. But if labor is ennobled when wrought by the hands of a freeman, how much more when associated with the dignity of the gentleman!

Let us guard, then, with the jealousy of genuine alarm, against that despicable spirit of utilitarianism which, like a huckster in the shambles, is always haggling with truth about her price. She is immeasurably more precious in herself than in all the uses to which men may put her. Truth, integrity, and honor are the highest attributes of any people, and the enjoyment of regulated freedom, under a wise and constitutional government, is its noblest privilege and reward.—Rev. B. M. Palmer.

"We can inform Jonathan what are the inevitable consequences of being too fond of glory—TAXES upon every article which enters into the mouth, or covers the back, or is placed under the foot; taxes upon everything which it is pleasant to see, hear, feel, smell, taste; taxes upon warmth, light, and locomotion; taxes upon everything on earth and the waters under the earth; on everything that comes from abroad or is grown at home; taxes on the raw material; taxes on every fresh value that is added to it by the industry of man; taxes on the sauce which pampers man's appetite and the drug that restores him to health; on the ermine which decorates the judge and the rope which hangs the criminal; on the poor man's salt and the rich man's spice; on the brass nails of the coffin and the ribbons of the bride; at bed or board—couchant or levant, we must pay. The schoolboy whips his taxed top; the beardless youth manages his taxed horse, with a taxed bridle, on a taxed road; and the dying Englishman, pouring his medicine, which has paid seven per cent., into a spoon which has paid fifteen per cent., flings himself back upon his chintz bed which has paid twenty-two per cent., and expires in the arms of an apothecary who has paid a licence of a hundred pounds for the privilege of putting him to death. His whole property is then immediately taxed from two to ten per cent. Beside the probate, large fees are demanded for burying him in the chancel; his virtues are handed down to posterity on taxed marble; and he is then gathered to his fathers, to be taxed no more."—Sydney Smith, in 1820.

LOS THE

Amendment," by F. E. Abbot. This series contains aggregate over two hundred pages of closely printed matter. Address THE INDEX, Drawer 35, Toledo, O.